A careful consideration of these figures shows that the "middleman" was not suffering during 2 of our depression years.

DOMESTIC COMPETITION

The most pronounced substitute for butter is oleomargarine. The consumption of margarine in the United States in the past year was only about 10 percent as much as the consumption of all butter. In recent years the consumption varied from about 10 to 15 percent, this variation being due largely to changes in the supply and prices of butter. When the price of butter was relatively high, the consumption of margarine increased. As the supply of butter increased and the price declined, even in the face of the depression, the consumer increased his purchase of butter and reduced his takings of margarine.

An interesting question arises: What would be the effect upon butter consumption and upon the price of butter of eliminating margarine? Since margarine is much cheaper than butter and is known to be consumed mostly by those whose purchasing power is low, it is not to be assumed that the eliminating of margarine would result in a corresponding increase in the consumption of butter. In other words, the consumption of butter would not be increased 10 percent, unless the price of butter were lowered. A study of the relation of the supply of butter or its consumption to price indicates that the total purchasing power of the consumer is a very important factor in determining the price of butter. It seems likely, therefore, that the consumption of butter would be increased only to the extent that the consumers who are using margarine would be able to buy butter. At the most, the total expenditures for margarine would be available for the purchase of butter. Assuming that the margarine consumers would spend their money for butter and not for cheaper fats, the increase in the price of butter might be as much as about 1.4 cents per pound. Allowing for some shift to other fats, such as lard or vegetable oil, it might be reasonably estimated that the price of butter, with the purchasing power of consumers at its present level, would be increased by a little more than 1 cent per pound by the elimination of the use of margarine as a substitute for butter.

Another question that arises is this: What would be the effect of changing the composition of margarine? Twenty years ago oleo oil, cottonseed oil, and neutral lard constituted the bulk of the fats used in the making of oleomargarine. Now cocoanut oil constitutes the bulk of the fat in margarine. The weight of the cocoanut oil in a pound of margarine increased from three-fourths of 1 percent in 1916 to 55 percent in 1932. The significance of this shift in the proportion of this fat in the margarine is emphasized by noting that the percentage of milk increased from 11 to 23 percent, leaving only a small percentage of the total weight to be made up from other fats. In November 1933 the price of nut margarine at Chicago was 7.5 cents per pound, and white animal-fat margarine was 9.3 cents per pound. The cost of the materials used in the manufacture of oleomargarine, as it was made in 1916, would have been 4 cents per pound. In other words, the shifting from using primarily animal fats and cottonseed oil to the use of cocoanut oil as the bulk of the fat, would reduce the cost, in terms of the prices of November 1933, by about 1.5 cents per pound. It is interesting to note that in November 1934 the price of the white animal-fat margarine was 1.8 cents per pound higher than the price of nut margarine.

To shift from the use primarily of an imported oil to a domestic product would not require a return to the use of the animal fats as the cottonseed, peanut, and soybean oils could be substituted for the cocoanut. Using equal quantities of cottonseed and soybean oil would raise the cost of the materials in the pound of margarine from 4 cents to approximately 5 cents per pound, which would be an increase of a little less than 1 cent per pound. This would tend to increase moderately the price of butter, but the effect would probably be not half as much as the total elimination of the use of margarine. It would, of course, tend to strengthen the market for cottonseed and soybeans.

FATS AND OILS IN RELATION TO DAIRYING

In formulating any policy in regard to butterfat and its imported substitutes, the situation with respect to all other principal fats and oils used in commerce must be taken into account.

This is because in an indirect and sometimes a direct way, all fats and oils produced in or imported to the United States compete more or less with each other. The suitability of a given oil for specific purposes is perhaps the first consideration, but the degree of use is also determined by its price and the cost of its chief competitors.

Soybean oil may be used for food, soap, paints, and varnishes. Likewise fish oils may be utilized for making soap, foodstuffs, and paints. Butter fat thus far is restricted to table and cooking purposes.

DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN PRODUCTION

Disappearance of fats and oils in this country has been tabulated by the Division of Statistical and Historical Research in the United States Department of Agriculture. The total domestic consumption for 1932 amounted to 6,823,000,000 pounds for domestic products of this class, while foreign-made oils and fats consumed here amounted to 1,323,000,000 pounds, which means that 16 percent of all fats and oils used here for all purposes came from abroad.

Taking them by broad classifications based on their chief uses, it is indicated that the percentages of total consumption of foreign-made products were greater in the case of fats and oils used for drying purposes and for soaps than they were for those used in food. In 1932 the imported drying oils represented 51 percent of total consumption here, the imported soap oils represented 44 percent of total disappearance here, while imported fats and oils used in food products constituted only 5 percent of the total home consumption.

To repeat, 95 percent of the oils and fats utilized here for food were produced within this country and only 5 percent were imported.

Looking at the domestic production picture, out of 6,823,000,000 pounds of fats and oils used here from our own home production, 80 percent went into foods, 12 percent into soaps, and only 3 percent into paints and varnishes.

Of the total imported fats and oils in 1932, coconut oil led with 173,000,000 pounds, edible olive oil was second, with 74,000,000 pounds, and palm oil was third with 25,000,000 pounds. Fish and marine oils, sesame oil, and palm-kernel oils made up the lesser balance.

Of the total domestic fats and oils used for food in 1932, butter led the list with 2,264,000,000 pounds of farm and factory product, lard was second, with 1,862,000,000 pounds, and domestic cottonseed oil was third, with 1,107,000,000 pounds. Of course, all the butter and lard went into food production, whereas a portion of the cottonseed oil was used for soap and other purposes.

TRADE BALANCE ON FATS AND OILS

From the same authority, it is shown that in 1933 the trade balance of this country was 916,000,000 pounds on the import side of the ledger for all primary fats and oils. Not since 1924 has this country had an export balance in fats and oils in its favor.

Our exports of fats and oils in 1933 were 808,000,000 pounds, of which lard was 584,000,000 pounds, oleo oil, 33,000,000 pounds, and butter only 1,190,000 pounds.

Our total fats and oils imports in 1933 were 1,750,000,000 pounds. Of this amount coconut oil and palm oil amounted to about 603,000,000 pounds, or nearly one-third. Butter imports in 1933 amounted to just about the same figure as our exports, 1,022,000 pounds.

Taking oleomargarine by itself, the total materials used in its manufacture in this country in 1932 amounted to 232,000,000 pounds. Of this total amount, 84,500,000 pounds came from animal sources—milk, butter, neutral lard, oleo oil and stearin, and oleo stock. The rest, or 147,500,000 pounds, was derived from vegetable sources—coconut, cottonseed, peanut, soybean, and other forms.

Coconut oil alone represented 128,000,000 pounds of the total of 232,000,000 pounds utilized in 1932 in domestic manufacture of oleomargarine.

There is a drive on now at Washington by the oleomargarine makers to bar foreign oils such as copra and coconut oil, palm oil, and palm-kernel oil in order that the odium of the "coconut cow" may be avoided. Makers of oleomargarine are astute enough to know that the term "coconut cow" has put a curse on their product, and they are now out to bar foreign oils in order to get away from this curse. To Wisconsin butter makers let me say that this move on the part of the oleomargarine makers is not a philanthropic move in the interest of the butter makers but is a program devised to substitute cottonseed oil in place of coconut and palm oil, and then advertise themselves as great benefactors to the Nation because they are aiding the home producer by buying home products. The Wisconsin butter maker will be just as bad off, if not worse off, with this kind of competition as he was before, because the oleomargarine maker will not have to pay the tax on imported coconut and palm oil. Under these conditions, we friends of the farmer at Washington will attempt to have some sort of handicap placed on the use of cottonseed oil as a substitute for butterfat, but with the South controlling both the House and the Senate, it seems utterly impossible for us to make any headway with a 3 to 1 majority against us in both Houses of Congress.

Oleomargarine, however, is not the only dairy substitute. Let me show you some of the milk substitutes that are now on the market. The following copies of the wording of well-known advertisements will show you articles that are now appearing on the market as substitutes for milk. These substitutes should be printed in all advertisements for what they really are—not the real thing but an imitation. It is only another illustration of how the farmer loses out in his fight for the home market and a decent price for his products.

ADVERTISING OF COCONUT OIL FILLED MILK BY ILLINOIS GROCERS

Note the implication in each case that filled milk—Milnut or Carolene brands—is the same as whole milk or evaporated whole milk:

Milk. Van Camp's evaporated, large can, 6 cents. Carolene, "so rich it whips", large can, 5 cents.

[Picture of can] Milnut, better than ordinary milk. Milk, "so rich it whips", 4 for 19 cents.

Borden's, Pet, Carnation, tall, milk, 6½ cents per can. Tall Milnut, 5 cents per can.

Milnut milk, 2 small cans, 5 cents.

Milk—Armour's, Libby, Carnation, Pet, 3 tall cans, 18 cents. Milnut, "so rich it whips", 3 tall cans, 15 cents.

Milk is higher. We still have some at the old prices. Dundee, Carnation, Pet, or Borden's, large cans, 3 cans, 19 cents. Milnut, large cans, 5 cents.

Carolene Milk, "so rich it whips", large can, 5 cents.

HEALTHY HERDS AND HIGH STANDARDS

I feel that one of the best ways for our Wisconsin producer to meet domestic competition is by setting a high standard both as to his herds and as to his cream and butter. Undoubtedly the drought has aided in bringing about a better grade and a healthier condition in our herds. Eradication of tuberculosis and Bang's disease will steadily improve conditions in our herds. A careful grading of cream and butter and the labeling of our products so that these grades are specifically set forth, will result in a demand for Wisconsin cream and Wisconsin butter. Such a program would have to be balanced by a careful expansion based on quality products. Such a program should also be applied to Wisconsin cheese which today does not mean anything in the consumer's market. I have asked storekeepers in Washington if they handled Wisconsin cheese and they would not know what you were talking about. If we had careful grading of Wisconsin cheese and sufficiently high standards, then you would have a demand that would mean considerable revenue to our Wisconsin producers.

Suppose farmer A delivers no. 1 cream and gets 30 cents per pound of butterfat, while farmer B delivers no. 2 grade cream and gets 28 cents per pound butterfat, according to mandatory State law. The manufacturer converts this cream into butter and sells it on the Chicago exchange. But on February 2, 1935, taking exact quotations then current, the 92 score butter made from no. 1 cream would have been worth 36 cents per pound, while the butter known as no. 90 score from the no. 2 grade cream would have brought 36¼ cents per pound. Thus the profit from the second-grade cream, based on the butter market quotations, would have been greater than for the first-grade cream.

Selfish interests, which are not usually allied to the better cooperative creamery associations now grading cream and labeling butter, are opposed to any system of quality improvement that emphasizes the butter grade in connection with the cream grade. This is partly due to their system of obtaining cream from long distances and of lower average quality for centralized car-lot butter, as against the well-knit frequently delivered cream at the cooperative local plants. When will farmers realize this distinct handicap and move to connect cream grading more firmly with consumer discrimination and premium prices?

Emergency herd tests for Bang's disease and tuberculosis have been a noteworthy part of the sanitary program of the A. A. A. and the Bureau of Animal Industry under the appropriation secured by the La Follette amendment to the act in 1934. States cooperating—without financial cost to them—were allowed to choose whether to take up T. B. testing or Bang's disease, depending on the status of their work to date. Work is now under way in more than 40 States. Out of a total allotment of the fund amounting to about $38,000,000, about $25,000,000 has been used for Bang's disease and $12,000,000 for T. B. testing and indemnity, and $1,000,000 for mastitis control. It is voluntary on the part of producers; no compulsion, but being widely used by breeders especially to get better herd foundations and to get set on more economic grounds.

Reactors from Bang's disease average about 40,000 cattle per month all over the country. Raise of $5 per head in maximum indemnity, making it $30 for grade reactors is contemplated, which will be helpful as grades are in majority over purebreds. If this raise is granted, and work proceeds at present rate, funds now available will last until about March 1, 1936. As the money is only available until December 31, 1935, an extension is desirable in the appropriation law.

FOREIGN COMPETITION

During 1935 there has been an ever-increasing influx of dairy products from abroad, and while such imports are not sufficient to displace any considerable quantity of the domestic product, nevertheless the effect on the price structure of the domestic product is disastrous. The President has the power to increase the tariff duty on foreign imports without consulting Congress up to 50 percent of the maximum limit. This power he has not seen fit to exercise, although he has been frequently requested to do so. The invariable answer of the administration leaders is that it would tend to increase the prices of dairy products to the consumer and also it would shut out of foreign markets the opportunity of American manufacturers to sell abroad. In other words, our farmers are being sold "down the river" in order that our manufacturers may have a better foreign market.

It would be a much better policy to let the farmers dispose of their surplus products abroad and thereby increase and revive their purchasing power, which, because of our high standard of living, would give our manufacturers a much more desirable market than any that could be found abroad. In this brief article I cannot touch upon reciprocal trade agreements which are now being written under the direction of the Secretary of State, Cordell Hull. I may, at some future date, prepare a brief article on this question, which is too large to be treated satisfactorily here.

CONCLUSION

First. What can be done in a legal way to protect the farmers and get for them not only the cost of production of their dairy products but also a fair profit in addition? First and foremost, we must have purchasing power on the part of the consumer. This is a solution of 90 percent of our problem. We must find work for the unemployed and we must get good wages for that work, because the industrial worker at home furnishes the ideal market.

Second. We must prosecute and punish by heavy fines and severe sentences the bootleggers, racketeers, and gangsters now operating in the dairy field. We must also restrict the profits of the manipulators of food markets and see that the producer and consumer get the benefit.

Third. We must not only uphold the principles and practices of cooperative associations in marketing, but we must also encourage, by wise legislation, larger and more effective cooperatives, so that the farmer exercises control of his distribution as well as his production. This will help him to get out from under the dominance of the middleman.

Fourth. We must continue the fight on the butter substitutes by shutting out the importation of foreign oils and by taxing substitute oils, such as vegetable and animal fats, which may be used in place of butterfats.

Fifth. And last but not least, by furnishing a market for surplus agricultural products abroad, by purchasing from those countries—like the British Isles, Germany, and France—which are not agricultural countries their manufactured articles in exchange for our agricultural products. Unfortunately there has been little or nothing to encourage the sale of manufactured goods from foreign countries across the seas in exchange for our agricultural products. This policy should be resumed so that we may again, as we did before the war, ship agricultural products out of the country and thereby sustain a market for our agricultural products.

Mr. Chairman, in the brief time I have I shall discuss some amendments which I propose to suggest for this bill. First, I ask the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], whether or not I got his statement correctly. I understood him to say that allotments of importations from foreign countries affected by the processing tax may be limited, but this does not affect those products on which there is not a processing tax. Is that correct?

Mr. JONES. No. It may affect imported competing products. It must be either a commodity on which there is a processing tax or a commodity which competes with that product.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. My point is this: In Wisconsin we are vitally interested in dairy products. There is no processing tax on dairy products. How are we going to protect our dairy products through this allotment arrangement?

Mr. JONES. Dairy products, of course, are a basic commodity, the gentleman understands?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Yes.

Mr. JONES. And commodities that compete with any of these commodities might be included. Some of the products of the hog, of course, compete with dairy products. There are various ways in which those commodities might be included in addition to being in direct competition with a commodity not subject to a processing tax.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin refer to increasing the tariff?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Yes; or placing an embargo on them entirely. I am talking especially about butter, in which the gentleman from Minnesota is also interested.

Mr. ANDRESEN. There will be a program on dairy products; and under section 22, relating to imports, the President will have the power to increase the duty.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Oh, yes; I know.

Mr. ANDRESEN. If he does.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Yes. I am not optimistic about the exercise of that power, as already there has been introduced into this country from abroad in the last 4 months 17,000,000 pounds of butter, so that we have not much confidence in the exercise of that power.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. No. I have only a little time and I want to discuss a few amendments. When I have finished with these amendments I shall be very glad to yield if there is any time left. I shall suggest an amendment on page 26, line 6, where the Secretary is empowered to examine books, papers, records, documents, and so on. I shall offer an amendment to include in that the Federal income tax, particularly the Federal income tax on such companies as deal in food products, and I have in mind particularly the Borden Co., the National Dairy Products Co., and General Foods, so that they cannot cover up with a holding company or through a subsidiary.

My idea is to find out what they are making out of this business, how much the processor is getting and how little the farmer is getting, and the thing to do is to include holding companies and subsidiaries as well as those handlers that are directly concerned. We know some of the huge salaries and bonuses paid to the officials of these companies even during depression years, when the farmer has not been able to get the cost of production for what he produced. Let us see who is making the profits out of the farmers' products—and I know of no better place to secure that information than from the Federal income-tax reports.

The best way to reach these facts is through the income tax.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. When I have finished.

On page 51, line 4, I want to add an additional section:

No agricultural products shall be imported into the United States unless such agricultural product shall bring to the producer of such product in the United States a price on the open market in excess of cost of production of such agricultural product in the United States. Cost of production as used herein shall mean cost of seed, labor, depreciation of tools and machinery, and buildings used in producing the same, a fair rental for the land used in such production, including insurance thereon, taxes, and special assessments, plus a reasonable profit.

One more amendment, which I have in mind and which I intend to offer is also on page 51, line 21. After the word "lands", add the following:

None of which shall be used for creating any agricultural product within the purview of this act.

My object in doing that is this: It is simple enough to enter into a lease or contract that you are not going to produce cotton, tobacco, or something else on certain acreage, and then turn that acreage into pasturage and raise either beef cattle or feed milk cows and get some more competition in the dairy industry. That is the thing I want to prevent, and that is why I am suggesting adding that amendment.

Last but not least, on page 20 I want to add another section:

SEC. —. (b) No marketing agreement, order, or regulation shall contain any term or provision which will tend to result in preventing or hindering any agricultural commodity or product thereof produced in any region or area of the United States from being brought into or sold in any other such region or area, or shall have the effect of subsidizing the production or sale of any agricultural commodity or product thereof in any such region or area, in such a manner that such commodity or product thereof will tend to be sold in such other region or area at prices which will tend to depress prices therein of such commodity or product thereof.

One of the things we have to contend with is the fact that every State, during this depression period, has been setting up barriers, in spite of the Constitution of the United States, to prohibit the introduction into another State of products that it raises in its own State. It is high time that we set our feet down on that and prevented it, or we will get ourselves into the same unenviable position that Europe is in now, where every little country or principality has set up tariff barriers against the introduction of products from any neighboring State. We are doing it now in the United States between different States, and this is one place where we can very well afford to put an end to it. I think we had better put an end to it before it gets wide-spread, because it will only result in damage and injury.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman said he was not optimistic as to the possibility of getting antidumping orders in effect. I want to state for the gentleman's information that within the last 60 days the Treasury Department issued a countervailing duty preventing the importation of peas into this country which were being financed by a firm in Holland.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Inasmuch as we can one-fourth of the peas consumed in the United States, I am glad to hear it, but I would like to have the gentleman see about shutting off the butter that is being brought in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK].

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I realize that very few Members on the Democratic side will vote against the present measure providing for amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I do not blame any Representative for voting for this measure if he has a rural district to represent, for without a question the triple A helped the farmers who have produced the commodities upon which the processing tax is levied and for which the benefits are paid.

In my representative capacity I am constrained to vote against this measure, because it adversely affects the great majority of the people of the First Congressional District of the State of Washington, which is composed of the entire city of Seattle and Kitsap County. I made inquiry several days ago of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration to ascertain the amount of benefits paid out under the act. I learn that more than $1,000,000,000 has already been paid to the farmers of the United States for restricting production, destroying hogs, burning wheat, and ploughing under cotton, that the State of Washington has received to date approximately $9,000,000 and that the district I represent has received the grand and startling sum of $374, whereas the cost of living has increased in this community approximately 25 percent. When I voted for the triple A 2 years ago I labored under no illusion as to its possible failure as far as the consuming public was concerned. On page 774 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 22, 1933, I stated:

By my affirmative vote I do not endorse as a general policy the restriction of production, for I am a firm believer in the policy of economic planning of consumption, for then production will take care of itself without any planning whatsoever.

I am also mindful of the fact that this measure may, to some degree, amount to a sales tax if no steps are taken to prevent the first processors from passing the cost on down to the consumer, but I feel that there is such a great spread between the prices paid to the farmers and those paid by the actual consumers that the tax that the processor pays can well be absorbed in this differential, which can be best illustrated by the fact that the farmers of the State of Washington are receiving approximately 5 cents a gallon for their milk, which when laid down to the consumer costs him 40 cents a gallon, hence a 5- or 10-cent increase to the price paid the farmer need not necessarily increase the cost to the consumer.

In another part of the same speech, on page 773, I made the following remark:

I might state in passing that I am of the opinion that there never will be any real relief until we cease to talk about the leaves and the bugs on the leaves and commence to speak in terms of the roots of the tree, its trunk and main limbs, for it is going to necessitate more than mere palliatives to remedy the situation, and to do that we must seriously lend ourselves to the intelligent solution of the problems of rent, interest, and profit.

Now let us see what actually happened during the 2-year administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I have before me the report of the administration of that act, released June 17, 1935. On page 241 the chapter designated as "Consumers Counsel" commences. Six and one-half pages of this entire report are devoted to the consumers' problem, while the report itself is 456 pages in length. Under the title "Salient Facts About Expenditures for Food" we have as follows:

1. Retail value of month's supply of 14 foods for typical family in 1934	$18.39
2. Value at farm (exclusive of benefit payments)	$6.90
3. Margin between farm value and retail price, including processing tax	$11.49
4. Farmers' share of consumer dollar spent for food for typical family in 1932—percent	32
5. Farmers' share in 1933, exclusive of benefit payments—percent	35
6. Farmers' share in 1934, exclusive of benefit payments—percent	37.5
7. Approximate increase in cost of living, 1934 over 1933—percent	5
8. Increase in retail prices of foods, 1934 over 1933—do	10
9. Approximate increase in urban purchasing power, 1934 over 1933—percent	9

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe these figures to be accurate. It is only natural that a department will juggle figures so that they show the department's activities up to the best advantage. Everyone knows that the increased cost of living since 1932 approximates 20 to 25 percent, particularly in retail prices for foods. It is very significant that the so-called "purge" of the A. A. A. took place a few months before this report was released. At that time Frederic Howe was dismissed as the Director of the Consumers' Counsel and at the same time Gardner Jackson and Jerome Frank, who had the consumers' interest at heart, were likewise dismissed.

In my opinion, had these individuals, together with the others who were discharged, remained with the Department until this report had been completed the figures would show the consumer at a greater disadvantage. But let us take the figures as they are. You have the farmers' share in 1934, exclusive of benefit payments, as 37½ percent, as compared to the farmers' share in 1933, exclusive of benefit payments, of 35 percent, which is a 2.5-percent increase. Now, divide 35 by 2.5 and you find the farmers' increase amounts to a gain of but 1.4 percent, while the increased cost of retail prices of foods of 1934 over 1933 is 10 percent. Here you have the answer to this whole problem. When the farmer receives an increase of 1½ percent the consumer must pay an increased cost of 10 percent.

The real difficulty, Mr. Chairman, in our present economic system is the wide spread between the price the farmer and workingman receive for their labors and the price they must pay for the products of the farmer and laborer when they buy them in return. The middlemen consume the greatest portion, and under the present program the share which the middleman receives is growing proportionately larger and, in my opinion, aggravating the situation rather than relieving it.

On page 244 of the same report, table 50 is as follows:

This, Mr. Chairman, is further proof that the consumer, and when I speak of consumer I mean the farmers as well as the workers, can never get ahead under such a program of restricted production. As you see in the above table, overalls, for which the farmer received 20 cents July 27, 1933, and 26 cents December 18, 1934, cost the worker and farmer $1.09 in 1933 and $1.60 in 1934, showing a spread of 89 cents between the farmer price and retail price in 1933, and a spread of 125.73 cents in 1934.

On page 285 of this same report the Department recognizes the fallacy of the program when it states:

Lasting improvement in the welfare of farmers is necessarily bound up with increased production and consumption of agricultural products. A long-view policy for agriculture, therefore, cannot passively accept the present limited purchasing power for food and fiber products of large numbers of our people, nor conceive future production on that basis. Rather it must contemplate a more abundant economy for all groups.

This, Mr. Chairman, is an admission by the Department that we must come soon to the economic planning of consumption rather than production if we are to survive without serious troubles.

On page 244 of this same report appears the following paragraph:

These comparisons do not take into account the situation of the unemployed. However, it appears that the real problem of the urban consumer was not the increase in food prices, but the lack of income among a large number of unemployed who had relied on industry for their livelihood.

In the State of Washington we still have more than 200,000 individuals upon the relief rolls. According to the figures of the F. E. R. A. for the month of January 1935, the amount received by each individual amounted to less than $1.66 per week. I am informed that a single person in the State of Washington who is on relief, receives but $1.35. With these said amounts every increase in the cost of food means further privation, suffering, and semistarvation for these unfortunate recipients of relief. When one looks forward to the work-relief program under the $4,000,000,000 bill and the "security wage" of $19 to $55 per month per family, one cannot help but come to the conclusion that a vote for further restricted production and increased cost to the consumer amounts to taking food from the mouths of the unfortunate who are already undernourished and practically desperate.

Now, as to the employed in the First Congressional District. Most of them are on a fixed salary or wages and any increase in the cost of living merely decreases their real wage. I have heard of no wage increases in that community, although I have heard of many wage cuts, so this program which we have before us today has worked against the interest of those who have been fortunate enough to have employment during these distressing times.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I represent a group of farmers in Kitsap County, and I here insert two typical letters, which state their position more vividly and more accurately than I could.

POULSBO, WASH., May 17, 1934.

Hon. M. A. ZIONCHECK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Thought I would write a few lines from the western front. All is not quiet on the western front. Conditions are bad for the small, diversified farmer, the millworker, and logger. I am writing you a few of my observations and of conditions as they are here. They may be of interest to you.

First, about the new deal. Have left my gate open for a year now, and it has not made its appearance yet. Poultry and dairy product prices are down to last year's levels, with feed prices $5 to $10 a ton higher. For example, sold 5 gallons of cream to the creamery. With a test of 30 percent butterfat, received $1.87 for 40 pounds, about 37 cents a gallon. No purchasing power created at this price. With processing tax and bonuses to wheat, corn, and hog farmers, what consideration is the small diversified farmer getting?

There is an enormous purchasing power dormant; take, for instance, the little farmers of western Washington and of the whole United States. Each 5-, 10-, 20-acre farm is a complete home and farm. It needs housing, machinery, automobiles, etc. The wheat farmer, say, with a section of land, 640 acres, maintains a home and farm equipment for one farm; 640 acres divided into 20-acre farms, as they average in small farms, would make 32 small farms and each a complete home with equipment. No assistance or thought has been given this enormous purchasing power by the A. A. A. We have been penalized by processing taxes to help wheat, corn, and hog farmers from our small disappearing income. The Frazier-Lemke bill would be the best relief in sight. I urge you to use your influence in securing its passage.

Now, a little news from the lumber industry. These are conditions at Port Gamble. The worker or the forgotten man who labors at the mill is rewarded as follows: Twenty-five hours a week at 42½ cents an hour; total weekly wage, $10.60. Board and room, $9.60. Forty cents a week for medical, hospital, and insurance, leaves a sum of 60 cents for weekly wage or $2.40 for the month. The company's rent for family houses was raised $5. Conditions like these do not need any agitators to foment discontent. The lumber prices have raised from $16, last spring's price, to present price of $28 and $30 per thousand, nearly 100 percent increase. The mill is cutting as much in 6 hours now as in 8 before everything speeded up. Logging camps are highball madhouses; now 6 hours' work accomplishes 8 hours' work. Men are scared to death for their jobs. The exploitation is still in its fury, more than ever before.

While I am on the lumber subject, I will compare the poultryman's plight in buying lumber. One year ago I could buy 1,000 feet of no. 1 common lumber with 4 cases of eggs. Now I have to have 8 cases to buy the same amount and grade. The old slogan, "Profits first, service after", is still the key to recovery. It is a shame that our reforms and changes come so slowly.

POULSBO, WASH., April 16, 1935.

Hon. MARION ZIONCHECK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We represent a group of farmers from Kitsap County, Wash., who, like farmers everywhere, are trying to find out what the processing tax, the ploughed-under wheat, the subsistent farming, and the 57 other varieties of Government remedies that are advertised over the radio and in the newspapers as a cure for the farmer's economic ailments, are all about.

We do know that the farmers in this locality are poor risks for financial insurance and are getting no better fast. We once made a living selling eggs and poultry products, but as no one has decided to pay us for plowing under the hens, after we pay the processing tax, the tax for retailing products, the dairy-products tax, the sales tax and the countless other taxes that are added to our grocery and feed bills, there isn't enough left to pay the personal and real-estate tax.

Consequently the Government takes our land and it is used for colonization by subsistent farmers. These usually are the embarrassing persons on the city relief rolls that make a politician's face red at election time, so they are exiled to the country at Government expense. A paid start of stock, machinery, tools, seed, and even a living is provided for these potential farmers, and the cost is financed as just another tax added to the burden already carried by the established farmer who has been foolish enough to stay out of debt. The subsistent farmers, it is assumed, will either get their living from the land, or from the rural communities, which are less able to support them but not so efficient in evading their responsibilities as are the urban authorities.

Neither can we understand the logic of paying our fellow farmers to plow under wheat, cotton, and corn, but still allow him to use the land for other agricultural purposes. For example, our Midwest brother gets a check from the Government to pay for the corn he does not raise. He puts the check in the bank and the land into buckwheat. The buckwheat is fed to a flock of chickens that are practically clear profit, and the farmer can afford to sell the eggs and poultry at a lower price than the Pacific coast poultryman who gets no Government aid and who has to pay high freight rates.

The Pacific coast rancher must pay an added cost to his feed corn to finance the processing tax; he must sell the poultry products at a lower price to meet the Midwest competition. Consequently the Western farmer loses his credit, taxes consume his home, and the abandoned farm is then ready for more subsistent farmers.

Very few farmers are chosen to make laws. But, if there is some concealed logic in the present plan of aiding the farmers by sending out more farmers financed by the Government to compete with the first group, or if there is any permanent care for the farm problem to take the earnings out of a farmer's pocket in one section of the country and place them in some other farmer's pocket somewhere else, we would like to know about it.

Very truly,

NORTH KITSAP POULTRY LOCAL.

The theory underlying this present bill is the old worn-out theory of supply and demand; that if we decrease the supply which the farmer produces, the demand increases and a greater price will be received for what the farmer produces, so that he can pay for the cost of production and get a little profit besides, and that thereby the demand of the farmer in his prosperity on industry will be such by way of new purchases that the factories will have to reemploy all the unemployed in order to satisfy this increased demand, and thereby everyone will again be prosperous. The proponents of this theory fail to mention where the purchasing power of the workers will come from or what they will purchase with.

We have had upward of 2 years' experience under this theory, and we find that, instead of prosperity for all, the poor have become poorer and the rich have become richer. I have a letter from the Treasury Department, dated May 21, 1935, in which the Commissioner sets out the relative decreases and increases of the different income class groups of 1933 as compared to the same groups of 1932. The net incomes of the $10,000 per year group saw their revenues decrease 5 percent in 1933 as compared with 1932, which does not take into consideration the 11,000,000 people who find themselves without any income whatsoever or those receiving less than $1,000 per year.

The income-tax payers who had a net income of $50,000 and over showed a 14-percent increase in 1933 as compared with 1932, while those who received a net income of $100,000 and over showed an increase of 23 percent over their incomes of 1932, and the increase in the number of returns of individuals reporting a net income of $1,000,000 and over increased from 20 to 46. I here quote from the book entitled "The Economic Consequences of the New Deal", by Benjamin Stolberg and Warren Jay Vinton, wherein they state:

> In the last 12 months of the new deal, from October 1933 to October 1934, the real weekly wages of our industrial workers have declined by 2 percent. Yet the dividends of our great corporations increased 17 percent in the same period. And their industrial profits in the first 9 months of 1934 were 76 percent greater than during the same period in 1933.

These figures speak louder than words, and it is very evident that we must get down to economic planning of consumption rather than production; that we must decrease in a marked manner the spread between the cost of the product to the consumer and the price paid to the worker and farmer for its production, if we are to get out of this, the longest and most severe depression in the history of our machine age.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, the bill we are now considering, so far as I am personally concerned, shows to me conclusively how difficult the work of a Congressman is. Personally I do not think that the benefits that are intended should be derived from this kind of legislation will ever come into being.

I do not believe we have the right to delegate to any body of men in this Union, or to any organization, the power to impose sentences, to take away men's liberty; but that is what is done in this bill. I do not believe we have any power under the Constitution to say that a majority of men engaged in agriculture can force a program on another minority group. I do not believe, for example, that this Government has the right to go into any State of this Union and try to regulate a business which is carried on wholly within the boundaries of the State.

These are my personal beliefs. This is the way I should like to vote; but I happen to be a Representative of, and was elected by, farmers in North Dakota who have voted 10 to 1 for this A. A. A. program. Those farmers are resting assured this afternoon that they will have a Representative here in Congress to give them that support, and I am willing to give it to them. I will vote for this bill, but I want you to understand that personally I do not believe we have a right to pass many of the provisions of this bill.

Answering the insistent question raised this afternoon as to what those opposed to the bill would suggest as a substitute, the answer, to my mind, is very easy. First, I say, enact Massingale cost-of-production bill for that portion of farm products used in this country.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Does the gentleman believe that bill is constitutional?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes; I do.

Mr. PIERCE. How can the gentleman feel that bill is constitutional if he regards the pending bill unconstitutional?

Mr. BURDICK. For the reason that the Massingale bill places cost of production only on that portion consumed within the borders of the United States. If the people raise more than that they would sell it at their peril.

I maintain that we have no moral right, either in Congress or elsewhere, to limit the amount of production in any country, because the human race for 6,000 years before Christ has been producing and it has never produced a bushel more than the human race needs. If they have, I ask now, where is it?

Here is my next question to you, beside the Massingale cost-of-production bill, which in my judgment is constitutional, I would suggest the bringing in of a bill that will refinance these farmers and spread this huge debt that they cannot pay now over a long period of time at a low rate of interest. Give them a chance to come out. You know as well as I do that today in America every farmer, on the average, owes at least twice as much as his property is worth, still under the ruling of the Supreme Court those farmers must pay. If they must pay, give them a chance to pay. We have a chance to do that in this Congress.

Mr. Chairman, there is a bill pending before this Congress that will do this very thing. It requires the signatures of 218 men to that petition up there to give it consideration, yet only 190 Members have signed the petition. You have a chance to enact this legislation if you want to do so.

Here is no. 3: During the period of distress, and while we are trying to work out a solution of this situation, the Congress may enact a moratorium measure for 2 years in order to prevent the Government from foreclosing upon loans for which they are responsible, and may I say to you Members that at this very moment the Government is foreclosing loans which it made to the people of this country. You can stop that if you want to. Another thing that should be done, but neither side of the House will do it, is to take control of the issue of the money and credit of this Nation and put it back in the Government itself.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PIERCE. The gentleman would do that through a moratorium act based upon the Minnesota case? Is that the way he would stop foreclosures?

Mr. BURDICK. I would declare a national moratorium for a period of 2 years and prevent Government agencies from foreclosing any mortgage where payment has not been made through no fault of the mortgagee.

Mr. PIERCE. Does the gentleman think, under the Minnesota case, the Supreme Court would declare such an act constitutional?

Mr. BURDICK. I do not know as I would be limited to the Minnesota case.

Mr. PIERCE. Is that not the only one we have at the present time?

Mr. BURDICK. That is the only one that our Supreme Court has passed upon. In that case the Supreme Court upheld it upon the ground that the mortgagor had to perform certain equities. I have no objection to certain limitations. I am simply pointing out to the Members of the House what can be done, instead of indulging in what we are doing at the present time.

My last point is that the Government should take over the control of the issuance of its money and credit that it never lost. We cannot escape this responsibility. The Congress is charged directly under the Constitution with the control of the issuance of money, yet we have surrendered this prerogative through various laws during the last 100 years until today what do we have? The cash in circulation is about $6,000,000,000, $4,000,000,000 of which has been issued by the private bankers of the country through the Federal Reserve System. We have surrendered this power of the American people to private banking interests. I say that under the Constitution this Government has never surrendered that power. The question has never been presented to the Supreme Court of the United States and if it is presented, from my experience as a lawyer I would say that the Supreme Court would hold that any attempt to give away the power to issue money and regulate the value thereof is unconstitutional.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. What does the gentleman think about the policy of the Government issuing money against its own obligations? In other words, making its own obligations security for another obligation?

Mr. BURDICK. On the Government debt of this country there is an annual interest burden of about one and one-quarter billion dollars that it would not be necessary to pay at all if the money was issued direct and upon any basis that we have for the issuance of money.

For example, if gold and silver is the basis upon which we issue currency, we have enough gold and silver on hand upon which we could have a currency issue of $20,000,000,000; yet there is in circulation only $6,000,000,000 and the private banking interests of the country have issued $4,000,000,000 of that.

Mr. Chairman, the ball game is on, but very few people can get to the ball game. We complain because the gate receipts are small. But the only reason they are small is because we have not tickets enough to go around. The people are complaining because they cannot get tickets to go in. We do not have enough money in circulation to do the Nation's business and remember that the amount of money in circulation plus the demand deposits in circulation multiplied by three in any one period of this country's history will give you the national income. Just try that out. For instance, what was the income in this country in 1920? First, what was the amount of cash and demand deposits on hand in this country in 1920? The amount of cash in circulation plus demand deposits was $21,000,000,000. Multiply that by three and you have the national income. When we look up the record we find that it shows that our national income at that time was $67,000,000,000. Take 1927. In 1927 we had cash in circulation and demand deposits of $25,000,000,000. Our national income was $77,000,000,000.

This does not strictly apply to the portion of the income retained as savings in business enterprises. However, the proportion of this type of income is so small and the difference between the price index of capital goods and that of consumers' goods is so slight for the most part that it was not deemed essential to compute a new index.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor at this time in order to secure some information. I dislike very much to break into the statements that are being made, but I should like to ask any one of the members of the Agricultural Committee a few questions on certain points of the bill which I have not been able to clear up in my own mind in the short time in which we have to consider it.

On page 7 of the bill, I should like to inquire as to why the growers of rice are permitted and encouraged to assign away the benefit payments they would likely have in due course for the purpose of production credit?

This seems to be the only provision of its kind in the bill, and I wish to inquire if this was placed in the bill because of the fact that the rice producers are in such financial straits that they must mortgage their potential benefit payments in order to secure production credit?

Mr. JONES. That provision is in the law at the present time. This is merely a repetition and this was wanted by the rice producers themselves, whose representatives were gathered here from all over the country in the early part of the session and asked that this provision be put in the bill. Their methods of production are peculiar and their methods of marketing and handling are peculiar, and they said this would be especially beneficial to them. The representatives gathered from every rice-production section of the country were here and asked that they be given this credit privilege, and it was put in at their request as an amendment to the old bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Now, on page 9, I wish to inquire whether or not agreements can be entered into on any or all farm commodities, whether basic or otherwise?

Mr. JONES. Agreements may be entered into, but the Secretary may not issue orders on any of these agreements that are binding on all handlers except these particular commodities named, milk and its products, fruits and vegetables, with the exceptions named.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then, to make it a little clearer, if the producers of any given commodity other than those set forth on page 10, paragraph 2, voluntarily enter into a marketing agreement, whether it be 65 percent or 95 percent of them, after having entered into this voluntary marketing agreement, as I understand, the Secretary of Agriculture may not issue orders covering those products.

Mr. JONES. He cannot do so under the terms of this bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then, on page 17 of the bill, lines 16 to 20, read:

> No person acting as a member of an agency established pursuant to this paragraph (B) shall be deemed to be acting in an official capacity, within the meaning of section 10 (g) of this title, unless such person receives compensation for his personal services from funds of the United States.

As I read the bill, it is my understanding that the Secretary may bring into operation an agency, and it appears from the language I have just read that there may be members of that agency other than those on the pay roll of the Federal Government.

Mr. JONES. Yes; that is particularly true of the local committees. The gentleman will understand that this particular provision puts under the ban men engaging in speculation in respect of a commodity and forbids any official from speculating on the exchanges or in futures markets, and so forth, in a commodity which they have a part in handling. When they have local committees that are mapping out the program, they are interested in the commodity, and it is felt that this ban should not be extended to them, and that is all it is intended to cover.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It seems to me on that point that is a very dangerous provision to have in the bill, because I think it could be determined that there are many people——

Mr. JONES. If these people draw anything from the Government, and some of them do draw a little pay, they are under the ban.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand that.

Mr. JONES. But if they are simply asked locally to help the local people who fashion most of these programs, it is felt if they are not being paid by the United States Government we did not quite have the right to forbid their engaging in such dealings.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If by chance a commodity operator should be placed on one of these agencies, he can certainly secure sufficient inside information to put him in position to make a wonderful scoop in the commodity markets from time to time by reason of having such inside information.

Mr. JONES. These men are selected by the producers in the communities themselves and they probably would not select that kind of man.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That agency, insofar as its personnel is concerned, then, is to be restricted to local people engaged in the production of the commodities in question.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In that event, it would probably help the situation considerably.

Then with reference to the base period for marketing agreements, mentioned on page 27, I should like to have a little clearer information as to how this base period can be shifted from 1909–14 to 1919–29. Can the gentleman give us a little information on that?

Mr. JONES. There are some of the commodities on which definite figures in the regular base period are not available in the Department of Agriculture; that is, the records were not kept accurately for those commodities during the former base period and they are not available. I believe I am correct in my recollection that this provision covers such commodities and provides that he may take this later period in order to arrive at just what the parity price would be and what the figures would show.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And that would be used only in the absence of these other figures.

Mr. JONES. That would be used only in the absence of definite figures on the regular base period.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The bill, on page 32, refers to specific tax rates, where it appears that the rates in effect as of June 1, 1935, are frozen until December 31, 1937. Is it possible under this provision of the bill and by reason of the freezing of these rates for the farmers to be denied or deprived of what might be termed "parity payments" or "parity benefits"?

Mr. JONES. No; those rates are frozen subject to this change. Refer to subdivision 4 which begins at the bottom of the page. They were frozen to make certain of the legality of the tax. Congress really enacted the processing tax under that provision beginning in subdivision 4, line 22. The regular method of varying those taxes is set out; that is, the Secretary of Agriculture may increase or decrease them, but if this power granted here is held invalid by the Supreme Court the tax automatically goes back to the fixed rate. In other words, these are only fixed and would only remain fixed in the event the power conferred by Congress to move them up and down is denied by the Supreme Court.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to express my appreciation of the great effort the members of the committee have made in an attempt to solve this problem. I wish I could agree with all the features of the bill. It appears to me that the people who founded this country, having prepared and signed and published the Declaration of Independence, established themselves as a free people.

Then they proceeded to draw up a Constitution. It was accepted and adopted. Through its terms and provisions rights were recognized, and to date have been guaranteed to that free people. Out of this Constitution there came a Federal Government, with limited powers which were specifically set forth therein. The powers not delegated to the Federal Government were retained unto the people themselves, and therein is their freedom.

The observation has been made that out of the sphere of liberty there evolved or was carved that of government, and that freedom was not created by a Federal Government. Free men carved our Government in the form in which we find it as defined and circumscribed by the Constitution.

Historical but unbounded and indefinite rights and privileges which our people have inherited must again be guarded as they were in times past. Many men who are Members of this body never until recent years were forced to give much consideration to fundamentals of this nature. Life moved along smoothly for us, and we exercised our liberty without much thought, if any, as to how it came to us.

Today we have heard remarks dealing with the great problems of modern life, industry, agriculture, world trade; domestic production, consumption, and exchange. Perhaps the greatest task of free men today, acting under the terrific pressure under which modern life has placed us, with all of its social, economic, and relationship problems—is that of requiring government to mind its own proper business. It can be well argued that there has come to us here in this House at this very hour the opportunity and the responsibility to say to government that it must desist from any further attempts, under any guise or pretense, to invade the liberties guaranteed and preserved for us by and through that great charter of human rights which the Supreme Court of this land has so recently shielded in its three sweeping decisions. Those who framed that Constitution did not bow down to or recognize that there was in existence anywhere or in any form an all-powerful state which goes before, or which is superior to, and of necessity in control of, individual life and effort. The philosophy of man's immortality may have led him to believe that insofar as spiritual matters are concerned there is an all-powerful and all-knowing Supreme Being; however, to recognize such a power insofar as a political state is concerned, having to do with the economic, social, and political actions of mankind, I submit, is to deprive man of his liberty and freedom while living his life here on earth.

Therein is the crux of this bill insofar as I am concerned. It seems to me that if we are to preserve our freedom in this country we must, working cooperatingly among ourselves, solve these problems independent of Federal control or Federal dictatorship in any form whatsoever. However, if the Members of this House and if the farmers of this country have come to the conclusion that they cannot, through cooperation with each other and in their own way, solve these problems themselves as free men, and that they are now ready to surrender the freedom which they have heretofore enjoyed and prospered under and all without any further effort now insist that Government strengthen its authority, that, I submit, is a startling situation. If this be true and if there be problems which must now be solved, then our people will have to come to the Government and sit down at its feet and say, "Mr. Federal Power, we are unable to reach the benefits which we must have, and therefore we seek your aid." Insofar as I am concerned, I believe that our people through cooperative, intelligent, and free effort accomplish fivefold to what will be accomplished when Federal bureaus interfere. Apparent in this bill there is such a plea now being made, as evidenced by the farmers of Mr. BURDICK's territory. They have indicated, he says, 10 to 1, I believe, that they now desire the Federal Government to step in and lead them out of the wilderness. That to me appears to be the substance of this bill. It has many things in it that I think are very commendable. At the same time, there is no question in my mind but that we are surrendering, perhaps once and for all, much of that freedom which we have heretofore enjoyed and exercised and prospered under. Personally I believe we did not go far enough in our own efforts before we appealed to the Government.

Perhaps the situation came down on us in a crash in such a manner that we felt compelled to rush into something, but we come right back to the proposition that millions of our farmers say that they desire now to travel this road, that they desire to be led by Federal authority, and in working out this bill I can see where the committee has in a somewhat marvelous way inserted provisions which call for cooperation among the farmers themselves by putting here two-thirds vote for producers, two-thirds vote for volume, and then at the same time, as I understand it, a majority of the producers can issue an edict whereby the Secretary must cancel an order which has been issued. Is that correct?

Mr. JONES. He may cancel if a majority of the producers want it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In my opinion, this bill will not bring to the farmers of this country the economic and social rights which they have reason to expect in this advanced day and age. It has been pointed out there are near 900,000,000 acres of farm land with a today's value of more than $30,000,000,000, and owned by more than 30,000,000 farm people. These farm folk must be recognized in a material and substantial manner. They are not paid cost for their production. They want wages comparable to those paid to people who produce the goods and services which farmers buy—goods in the form of something to consume in stomach and on body and overhead. Goods in the form of travel. In the form of a few luxuries; in the form of education and training for their children. To have these things the farmers must be able to sell their labor in the form of the goods drawn from their farms at a price which compares favorably with that paid by them to the other branches of our population.

The organized processors of this land who are engaged in purchasing farm goods and processing them into finished products will not pay the farmers a reasonable price for their labor unless those processors are forced to do so. This bill does not carry the necessary teeth. It will not prove satisfactory to the farmers. There are too many exemptions. The Supreme Court properly held that certain powers should not be delegated by Congress to the Federal administrative officers. Now, to present a bill which comes within the circumscribing of the Supreme Court insofar as the powers that may be delegated by Congress to the Secretary of Agriculture, or an administrative office not responsible directly to the people, is one thing. But what the farm population wants is a bill which will assist the farmers—all of the farmers, in whatever State they may be located and for whatever crop they may be growing—giving them cost plus a profit for the goods they place on the market. If this bill protects the cotton grower and leaves the farmer who grows vegetables for the canner, fruits for the canner, beef, wool, mohair, and a hundred other crops without any protection, we should know that will not work. And this bill exempts canned vegetables, canned fruits, and many other crops from any kind of control or protection or benefits.

Furthermore, it will not be possible for the Secretary to reach out and gather into his hands the control of all the powers and purposes and aims set forth in the bill. When he attempts to do that it will set in motion other forces which will be just as disturbing and damaging as some force which he attempts to correct. There is too much artificial interference. Time and tide wait for no man to act. Neither does weather. The ebb and flow of world trade, the offers to buy and sell of the trader, and the increased and decreased amount of production by reason of climatic conditions, such as rainfall or lack of rainfall, are matters beyond the control of the Secretary.

His Bureau cannot work rapidly enough to meet the constantly changing factors that are involved in his calculations as to production, consumption, the ordering of the investigations, the determination of the facts based on the findings, the calling of hearings, the securing of approval of handlers and producers, the issuance of orders, and through the votes of a majority the cancelation of those orders after having once been issued. It is not reasonable to expect that a bill such as here presented will work out satisfactorily to the farmer, because this is a makeshift—a result of the original Agricultural Adjustment Act plus a lot of amendments which were on the way to be added to the original act, and which were arrested by a Supreme Court decision, and then some more additions which are hoped to be found constitutional.

Page 7, paragraph (8), sets forth a provision with reference to the growing of rice which appears to me to be grossly unfair to the rice growers of the country. When the production credit is in such a state that growers must assign or contract away the potential benefit payments they may receive under the act I think that is conclusive evidence the rice provisions of the A. A. A. are not now giving the relief it was claimed would be forthcoming on their enactment. This is a provision which must ultimately work hardships on the rice growers.

IMPORTS

Section 30, page 49, of the bill deals with this highly important matter of imports. This is not a strong section. There is too much beating around the bush. Here we are dealing with a vital matter. A policy which permits the operation of a plan of reducing crops, retiring acreage, holding down production, and at the same time allows millions of tons of farm products to come into this country from other lands is one in which I cannot concur.

Many countries have and are entering into reciprocal trade agreements with the United States. They will expect and will demand the right to ship farm goods into this country in increasing quantities. It is being done now. As prices advance, more goods will be offered to this country. Throughout the world there can be found warehouses with bulging sides filled with the goods of other lands. The highly trained and alert international traders are keenly aware of every point of advance or decline in the commodity markets. It is such an easy matter for them to flash an order to buy or to sell. Market news and other information having to do with human relations at home and abroad encircles the globe with electrical rapidity. Day and night, every second of each day, news travels to all points of the world from other points. In the fraction of a second commodity markets can be passed around the world to the waiting traders. Governmental machinery is too slow for this game. "Whenever the President has reason to believe." Who is going to give any President that "reason to believe"? Cannot we comprehend those countries enjoying reciprocal trade treaties will exert every influence at their command to pour more and more goods into this market as our production recedes through the retirement of acreage and the giving of benefit payments to our farmers as a price to take away from them the domestic market so that it may be filled by goods imported from other countries? Sure! Investigations are to be made—but how? The President shall specify to the United States Tariff Commission how the investigations shall be made. Why not let the Tariff Commission proceed under its own rules and make its investigation quickly but along its established lines? Why should its powers be set aside by some regulation issued by the President to support some reason he may have? If the importation of goods from other lands are causing great distress in our land, why not our Congress have the power to place an embargo on further importation? Why not make it mandatory on the part of the President that he must act upon the findings of the Tariff Commission? Furthermore, any decision of the President as to facts under this section shall be final. The committee, no doubt, has done its best in dealing with this question of imports. However, it is my opinion the act has not gone far enough.

In conclusion, I do not wish to be understood as contending that the Government should not at any time interfere in the interests of the farmer, nor do I contend that the present bill is wholly bad. I do most emphatically contend, however, that it is not an adequate solution to the problem of our 30,000,000 American farmers. With great responsibility in a great emergency must necessarily come impatience to fashion some sort of bill to meet a critical situation. This bill proposes to do that, but does it only partially; and I for one cannot support it in its inadequacy to meet our fundamental problem. It is true that the bill provides for payments to the farmers which help to mitigate a depressing and a miserable state of affairs. Yet that mitigation is bought at a stupendous price; that price is the sacrifice to decreased production while millions of our people are literally crying for food; that price is the sacrifice of personal liberty which cost the fathers of our country a vast amount of suffering and bloodshed to establish and under which our people have risen from a state of serfdom to that of a sovereign; and, finally, that price is the perpetuation of merciless poverty in the midst of plenty. Why must we continue the hopeless policy of cutting down production, plowing under food, when the world is crying for the products of the farm? Why must we continue the stupid policy of actually taxing part of our people in order to pay another part to destroy the very food we need? Why cannot a bill be fashioned which will permit the farmer to till and sow as nature intended that he should, and in return pay him the cost of his production plus a small profit to enable him to bring up his family in the independence to which they are entitled? I cannot and shall not by voting for this bill sacrifice the future physical and spiritual welfare of our farm population for a meager mess of pottage thrown at them now in the form of charitable benefit payments. My vote must be in the negative.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD].

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak in behalf of the farmers of New York State who have not received any benefit from the processing tax. It has been a detriment to them. For the most part, we are dairy farmers, and we have not received any more for our dairy products, while the feed for our stock has cost us much more. I cannot see where the farmers of New York State or the East are going to get any benefit from this legislation. They will still have to pay more for what they buy, so the entire legislation, as I see it, will not be of any benefit to them.

I want to speak a little about production and the plowing under of wheat and cotton and the destroying of pigs. I happened to be chairman of the Red Cross in my section for some years, during the war period and since that time. During the time when the Red Cross had flour to distribute to the poor—and cotton clothing, socks, and underwear—to feed them, we were able to take care of them in very good shape, especially in the winter months. During this time, when crops have been plowed under and these products have not been available, it has cost us a great deal more to maintain our poor. If we might have those crops, if we might have the cotton and the wheat, we could give it to our people and save a great deal of suffering.

We are not producing any more than we need in this country. We are not producing enough. The only trouble is in the distribution. If we were distributing to our poor people what we are wasting, what we are plowing under, and what we are curtailing, they would be better taken care of than now. They would be much happier. They could have a living and they could have warm clothes to wear. I hope that we may get that distribution, that we may give to the poor the proper amount of wheat and other crops, and that we may give them the proper amount of clothing to keep them warm. It will permit the cotton farmer to raise more cotton and the wheat farmer to raise more wheat, and it will take care of the people who are suffering, especially during the winter months. This is true in our section of the country, and it would be much better for the entire country.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LORD. I yield.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The gentleman says that he thinks the farmers of New York State should not have to pay any more for their feed.

Mr. LORD. No; I did not say that.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The gentleman says he is against the bill because his farmers will not be benefited inasmuch as the processing tax requires them to pay more for their feed.

Mr. LORD. I did not say that. I did not say I was against the bill. I was simply telling how it worked out in the State of New York.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The gentleman says he does not feel that the wheat farmers should go on producing wheat at 30 cents a bushel and the corn farmer should go on producing corn at 10 cents, does he?

Mr. LORD. No.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Even though that makes cheap feed for the dairy farmers.

Mr. LORD. I did not say I was opposed to the bill. I was telling the way it worked out in New York State.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JONES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow, and that further general debate on the bill H. R. 8492 be limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from Kansas and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week may be dispensed with.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us what business is in order on these days?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Private Calendar is in order on Tuesday and the call of the committees is in order on Wednesday. We want to go on with this bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman does not think we shall finish the bill tomorrow, then?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is hoped that we shall finish the bill tomorrow. We have other matters that we feel ought to be taken up. The deficiency bill is one of them.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. What will follow this bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am not sure, but the deficiency bill is ready and is quite important.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman, then, would go on with the deficiency bill on Wednesday if this bill is concluded in time?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think that is the order of business.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

JAMES J. DEIGHAN

Mr. STACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STACK. Mr. Speaker, on the 14th day of June 1935 the great State of Pennsylvania lost a distinguished son in the untimely death of James J. Deighan.

The American Legion lost a sterling soldier and comrade in the person of Comrade James J. Deighan, department adjutant.

Commander Harry K. Stinger and every World War veteran of the Sixth District of Pennsylvania lost a distinguished friend and advocate when the Great Bugler sounded taps over their buddy, James J. Deighan.

Jim Deighan served with honor and distinction as a member of the Nation's armed forces in the Eightieth Division of the American Expeditionary Forces in 1918. He was honorably mustered from the military rolls on July 15, 1919. As a chartered member of the Woodrow Wilson Post, No. 2, Department of Pennsylvania, the American Legion, he was active for many years in the Legion's program, and in 1923 was chosen by the late J. Leo Collins, then department commander, as the department adjutant, in which capacity he continued to serve until his death. He was an authority on matters pertaining to the service men and women, and his advice upon such subjects was sought and followed throughout the United States. His innate disposition endeared him in the hearts of his friends and earned for him a Nation-wide reputation and appreciation for his meritorious labors and services on behalf of veterans and the widows and orphans of veterans. His life was a noble one spent in untiring effort to help the other fellow. He so lived that when his summons came to join the innumerable caravan he went with head erect, a smile upon his face, mute evidence of his unfaltering trust in his God and the knowledge that he had done his part in life honorably and well. May we emulate his splendid example. He was a kind and loving husband and father.

The Sixth District and the American Legion of Pennsylvania, through its commander, Harry K. Stinger, expresses the wish of all of us when he tells Mrs. Deighan that she and her children have our sincere sympathy in their bereavement.

NUISANCE AND SALES TAX RESOLUTION

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I am unalterably opposed to House Joint Resolution No. 324, extending the nuisance and sales taxes for a period of 2 years.

I believe it is inexcusable to continue these sales levies, which fall on rich and poor alike, especially so long as congressional leaders are discouraging the bringing about of a systematic revision of the tax laws to place a greater share of the burden on those best able to pay through inheritance taxes, income surtaxes, and excess-profit levies on corporations.

This resolution provides for continuing for 2 years the sales taxes now imposed on matches, electricity, automobiles and trucks, tires and tubes, auto accessories, mechanical refrigerators, lubricating oils, toilet preparations, radios and phonographs, cameras, firearms, sporting goods, chewing gum, furs, jewelry, brewer's wort, grape concentrate, gasoline, and a number of other commodities. It also levies a tax on telegrams, telephone calls, conveyances, and transfer of bonds.

The costs of these taxes fall on the common people in undue proportion. Instead of making an effort to levy taxes on the basis of ability to pay, through a revision of our inheritance, income, and excess-profit taxes, the line of least resistance is being followed, and these taxes, which were appropriately described as nuisance taxes by a headline in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a day or two ago, are being continued for not merely 1 year but for 2 years.

The alibi is advanced that these are emergency taxes and we must act quickly lest they lapse at the end of the fiscal year. The fact that many of them will lapse has been known since the opening of the session. Until this week, however, no effort has been made by those charged with the responsibility of formulating tax policies to substitute other taxes in their stead which will be based on the ability of the taxpayer to pay for the cost of Government. At a time when dividends are increasing rapidly, adding to the stock of those who are comfortably fixed, it is manifestly unfair to continue to levy nuisance taxes on many of the things necessary in the home of the poor while the increased dividends are not also being asked to carry more of the emergency-tax burden.

Furthermore, under this resolution, it is proposed to continue the taxes for a 2-year period, rather than for the duration of the emergency or for 1 year. Most of these taxes have been in effect since they were first enacted by a Democratic-Republican combination in 1932, and apparently the plan is to continue them indefinitely. While their continuation is now sponsored by Democratic leaders, there seems to be no serious objection on the part of the Republican leadership, spokesmen for that party having indicated that if they had the power they would extend the principle of the sales tax further to impose levies on all sales.

These sales and nuisance taxes have been imposed on all who must use matches, automobiles and trucks, tires and tubes, and many other necessities for 3 years. First-class postage has been increased 50 percent since 1932, the advocates of this method of raising revenue contending that it must be obtained in this way because income, inheritance, and excess-profit taxes would not produce returns. With nearly a fourth of our population on relief and a large proportion of the others in desperate financial circumstances, prompt action should be taken to readjust our tax system and remove the burden from those already oppressed.

The extraordinary costs of correcting our economic maladjustments should be placed on those whose dividends and returns from capital invested are being rapidly increased and who have ability to pay. The 10-cent-store fortunes and similar concentrated wealth now being tossed away on foreign soils should make a larger contribution in times of unusual governmental need for funds before we continue a tax system for 2 years which takes the pennies of the poor, so essential to enable them to even buy food and clothing.

I believe that the issue should be met squarely by raising the rates on excess profits, gifts, inheritances, and incomes, instead of drifting along, making extensions for 1 and 2 years of sales and nuisance taxes under which the victims of the depression are paying an undue proportion of its cost.

It is indefensible on the part of the leaders to bring this tax proposal up in its present form, under a gag rule which limits debate on each side to 20 minutes and consideration of the measure to less than 1 hour. Under this procedure there is no opportunity to correct this resolution by offering amendments to either increase, decrease, eliminate, or add to the legislation. The resolution should be overwhelmingly rejected and a comprehensive tax bill substituted which will equalize the burdens of taxation and distribute them fairly.

WHAT CAN WE DO CONSTITUTIONALLY, AND DO IT NOW, TO BRING ABOUT AN ADJUSTMENT OF OUR FINANCIAL SITUATION?

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD concerning the money question.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, what one thing can be done by this Congress, and constitutionally done, that would lay the groundwork for future prosperity of the entire country, and at the same time bring relief to the financially distressed which would be almost immediate in its effect? In answering this question I realize, of course, that there are many divergent views on this great question. Some sense what it is; some have a hazy conception of it; some are totally ignorant both as to the immediate or ultimate benefits of the proposition; some understand it but, for selfish reasons, take a most uncompromising stand against it; some are too much afraid that an out-and-out stand on the subject would render their tenure in Congress less secure. For any or all of these reasons, it will be difficult, but not impossible, to put this program into actual operation.

One important step has been gained by the decision of the Supreme Court holding the N. R. A. unconstitutional. In any plan to be presented to Congress hereafter it should be reasonably certain, in the first instance, that any such plan is constitutional. Had the proponents of the N. R. A. been Members of Congress instead of experts on the theory of government, no such plan as the N. R. A. would have been adopted by Congress. Experts and theorists have their place in our system of government, but to permit them to write laws is as dangerous to our liberties as it has now become embarrassing to the administration. Hereafter, I hope it can be said, that Congress will endeavor to work out its own program in cooperation with the President.

To those who have any keen conception of the framework of our Government, and its three departments of duties and responsibilities, it has been, for several months, quite apparent that the Constitution forbids the delegation of unlimited power to any department of Government. Congress cannot confer unlimited power upon the executive, the judiciary, or assume that power itself. When any attempt to do so is made, it not only violates our theory of three departments of this Government, but it violates another paramount principle guaranteed by the Constitution—that State governments have, in the adoption of the Constitution itself, reserved certain powers which the State alone can exercise. After the Constitution was adopted, with this explicit limitation on Federal power, each succeeding State as it came into the Union accepted the doctrine laid down in the Constitution; namely, that the Federal power of the Government was limited and that the States themselves should never be called upon to surrender their sovereign power.

To say that Congress can delegate power to the President to regulate business which is strictly intrastate would be an abject surrender of the sovereign power of the States, and there can be no logical argument against the decision of the Supreme Court holding, in effect, that this attempted delegation of power was unconstitutional.

Instead of attempting to change the Constitution it would be a much more valuable effort to gain a clear conception of what this Government was intended to be, and then shape legislation in Congress recognizing certain fundamentals which have always guided our conduct. Should a time arise when it is necessary to change our fundamental law, the way is open to us to do that very thing. But until we make that change in our fundamental law, it would further good government more by following the fundamental law than to attempt, by the application of some hair-trigger theory of government, to override what our experience has shown to be for our best interests.

Congress, itself, does not have the power to pass any law which shall strip States of their sovereign power. Much less has Congress the right to delegate this power. The Constitution provides:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people (amendment 10).

There is not any question but what the source of all power was intended to be left with the people (functioning in State governments), and any power granted to Congress, therefore, was a limited power so long as a State conforms to the injunction placed upon them by the Constitution, and which all States expressly agreed to, there is not any power in this Government that can take away from States, their own sovereign power to function as a government. Section 4 of the Constitution provides:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of Government.

When the Constitution was adopted, the Constitution expressly conferred upon Congress the sole right—

> To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standards of weights and measures (sec. 8).

To make the power of Congress exclusive in regard to coining money, the States were specifically enjoined from that function. Among the injunctions against the States, the Constitution declares:

> No State shall * * * coin money (sec. 10).

That Congress did at one time have the sole power to coin money is not open to debate, but as to the question of whether or not Congress still has this right, and the sole right, is the question which, when answered in the affirmative, will set our financial house in order. It will bring immediate and permanent relief to a people who are rich in everything except a proper and sufficient medium of exchange.

Congress has never constitutionally surrendered the right to coin money, yet, through acts of Congress creating national banks, the Federal Reserve System, and the authorization of bond issues, it has, in effect, surrendered the power to coin money. That power has been surrendered to private interests, and by mere approval and custom the system has been in operation ever since the Government was organized, and secured open approval by Salmon P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury under President Lincoln, temporarily and unconstitutionally surrendering the power to issue money to the private banking interests of the Nation.

What is our situation today as a result of the surrender of this power? The total circulation in the country is less than $6,000,000,000, and we find that the Federal Reserve Board, a private institution serving private banking interests, and not the Government, has issued nearly four billion of the six billion now in circulation. The Government prints the money, hands it over to the private system to sign and circulate, and all the charge made for this service by the Government is the actual cost of printing. As security for the unsigned money the Federal Reserve Board places with the Government, securities which the Government will accept. Usually those securities are Government bonds. These bonds draw interest, and while they are left as security the interest accumulations belong to the private banking system. Likewise, the actual money is then loaned out to the public and interest is collected on that, resulting in a double interest system to the private interests.

Not only that, but when the money is loaned out to the public a credit loan or 10 times the amount of cash on hand can be and is made. For example, if the Government has permitted the private system to issue $4,000,000,000 in new currency—for the cost of printing—then, using this $4,000,000,000 as a basis for credit loans, the private system can loan out $40,000,000,000 in credit and collect interest on forty billion of credit money and also on four billion of securities placed with the Government as security for the issue of the four billion, permitting an artificial principal of forty-four billion to operate, upon which the public must pay the annual interest charge on the entire actual and artificial principal.

To show how abjectly this Government has surrendered to the private banking interests, the proof is so overwhelmingly abundant that simply to state the proposition is to prove it. Our present Federal debt, represented by bond issues, is now close to $40,000,000,000. The Government cannot pay its obligations with bonds, hence the bonds must be exchanged for money. The Government sells its bonds to the private banking interests, who charge the Government from 3¼ to 3⅞ percent, and in payment for the bonds the private bankers are gracious enough to pay the Government for the bonds by extending the Government a credit balance on their private books. When the private system needs more actual cash to hold up its fictitious credit structure, the same bonds that were thus purchased are returned to the Government as security for a new currency issue. Thus the Government gets their own bonds back in their possession as security, and in the meantime the private banking interests get away with the cash and the actual ownership of the bonds. They collect the interest both ways and use the Government's own money to carry on the transaction.

It is quite obvious that if the Government can supply the private banking system with actual money to carry on their private operations, then the Government cannot deny that it would have the right to issue its own money and cut out this private loot of interest.

The present annual interest burden of the people of this country on the Government debt is now well over one and a quarter billion dollars. Can there be any justification for anyone to maintain a system that voluntarily and unconstitutionally hands over to private interests an annual harvest or over a billion dollars?

How long would it take, by the saving of this annual interest charge, to extinguish the national debt? How long would it take, by saving this annual contribution to the private money interests of the country, to pay the soldiers their adjusted compensation? How long would it take, if we abandoned this bankers' milking system, to create a fund that would properly take care of the aged?

The one stock argument against the plan of the Government's taking over the control of its own cash and credit is that to do so would produce an inflation of our currency. If to save an annual interest burden of over a billion dollars will be the cause of an inflation, then, in the name of the suffering millions, let us have that kind of inflation.

With a gold base of over $8,000,000,000, there can be predicated upon it a currency issue of $20,000,000,000 before there is one step made in the direction of inflation. Those who shout the loudest against inflation and insist upon keeping the money out of circulation and issuing Government bonds instead are the ones who are guilty of any inflation, if there is to be any. The very worst kind of inflation is the inflation of credit all based on borrowed money, which means the payment of interest.

Those who fear inflation apparently do not understand what money is. Money is not property, money is not wealth; money, in its simplest sense, is nothing more or less than a medium of exchange by which we are able to exchange our commodities and labor. There should always be a sufficient amount of money in circulation to do our natural and legitimate business. Even if we admit that demand credit in banks is the equal of money in the process of this exchange of commodities and labor, still we do not have more than 50 percent of money and credits demanded by normal business. Our national income can be measured almost accurately by the amount of available cash and demand credit of the country, and any period of our history can be taken as proof of this statement. Our national income can be said, at all times, to be just three times the amount of the money in circulation, including demand deposits available for instant use.

In 1920 the amount of money in circulation, including demand deposits, was $21,000,000,000.

In 1920 our productive national income was $67,000,000,000.

In 1929 the amount of money in circulation, including demand deposits, was $26,000,000,000.

In 1929 our productive national income was $81,000,000,000.

In 1934 the amount of money in circulation, including demand deposits, was $17,000,000,000.

In 1934 our productive national income was $46,000,000,000.

Those interested in these tables may have the benefit of the full information contained in tables submitted by me in my speech on the floor under date of June 17, 1935.

Business in this country is actually starving out, and, with it, the chance of employment, because we do not have a sufficient amount of money in circulation to do the Nation's business. We need at least $33,000,000,000 in exchange medium but have only a fraction over half of that amount. I am willing to predict for the year 1935 that our national income will be based upon the amount of circulation, and that history will repeat itself.

If the opponents of the plan here put forward to have Congress retake its power to coin money and regulate the value thereof will quit talking inflation and study the economic history of the country, we will all soon arrive at a complete understanding that there should always be a sufficient amount of money in circulation to do our business, and that instead of going in debt to carry on our credit system, we should issue Government notes, based upon our legitimate right to issue money on the prevailing basis—the present one of a metal basis—for national needs.

If we take over the Federal Reserve System, and do our own issuing hereafter, will it be constitutional? I have been unable to find anywhere where this power was ever surrendered by Congress. If it has been surrendered, it was clearly unconstitutional, for that power cannot be delegated even to the Chief Executive, much less a private banking fraternity. The issuance of Federal Reserve banknotes, at this very moment, is unconstitutional. It has been sanctioned by use and custom. The question has never been raised before the Supreme Court. In light of the clear and unmistakable language of the Constitution, Congress cannot relieve itself of this obligation. What we need now is not a law but a declaration of policy, which shall state emphatically that from this moment on we shall assume and take charge of our own money and our own credit. If any administration, Democratic or Republican, would refuse to permit private banking interest to issue money, they would be wholly within their rights as defined in the Constitution. We do not necessarily have to stop with this statement—we can go further, and by law take over the Federal Reserve System, and by law prevent any person, firm, or corporation from issuing any form of money to be put into circulation. That would stop the private steal resulting in the huge annual interest burden.

Following the present system as abject slaves, we have seen enacted in this country the impoverishment of every third generation. We have seen the old pioneers of Boston and New York, after losing their property under an ownership of 50 years, compelled to move on west through the wilderness to acquire new homes. Having bared their breasts to the arrows of the savages and having built in the wilderness a new home, we have seen that same band of pioneers at the end of the next period of 50 years, compelled to move on farther to the West. There they again made new homes on the prairies of Illinois, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, easily forgetting the financial troubles of the past because of the unlimited opportunities open to them in this new country. But again history repeated itself, and in about the year 1880, these pioneers of Illinois, Wisconsin, and Minnesota were overcome with the same fate that confiscated the property of their ancestors. Again they swarmed on to the West and settled Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, the Dakotas, and Montana. There they erected sod houses and lived happily in the surroundings of new golden opportunities. In these States in the next 50 years they built empires. Cities, churches, schools, farm homes, roads, telephones, and every possible institution known to modern civilization sprang up. Railroads spanned the country because of the new business created. Men could always find work as these endless empires were in the course of construction. But the end came with dramatic suddenness, and an end the like of which this country never before experienced. The final end of the trail of new homes in the wilderness had been reached, and the plan of their ancestors to move on to the West was brought to a final and immovable end.

They could not move farther on, because there was no more West. It was gone forever. Just 50 years from 1880 we find these western empire builders again losing their homes. The debt had overtaken their ability to pay. When this end came, it affected every community in the United States. Our Boston, the hub of the universe, did not escape. Labor in the East, manufacturing in the East, every channel of trade in the Union became affected because the end of the trail in seeking new opportunities in an endless frontier had been reached. That is the very reason why our financial difficulties at the present time are so acute; that is the main reason why we have had a national break-down in business.

This public debt and the annual interest paid to private interests began just at the close of the Revolution and has been in operation ever since. The soldiers of the Revolution were paid in continental money. It became worthless before the Nation was organized. Soldiers parted with this money for a few cents on the dollar. The wealthy men of the Nation bought up this money and when the Government was established, private interest, led by Alexander Hamilton, insisted that this continental currency should be redeemed by the Government at 100 cents on the dollar by a bond issue. That was carried through and the holders of the continental money made a harvest. Great fortunes were made in this country by the select few, and having once tasted of this method of getting something for nothing, they have kept it up ever since.

How do we stand financially now that we have reached the final end of the trail to the golden opportunities of the West? We find that we have a public and private debt of $300,000,000,000, upon which we pay an annual tribute in interest of $15,000,000,000, or more than the income in 1934 of labor and agriculture. What have we in property? Measuring all property in the United States at its actual value, and assuming that business property, railroads, farms, and other basic business enterprises of the Nation will suffer no further losses, we do not have in property more than 50 percent of what we owe. Yet we are told that we must pay. With what, I ask, shall we pay?

The system that has produced these results should be immediately abandoned. We should retake the power in Congress to issue money. We should eliminate the private interests that now use the Government's money and credit for their own selfish interest. We should eliminate this annual interest burden, which, just as sure as God lives, will overcome any business in the world in the long run. Farmers owe more than twice as much as they can pay, yet when we suggest a plan by which the debt can be spread over a number of years at a reduced interest rate, some of our members of Congress will not permit us even the opportunity of discussing the farm finance question before this House. Congressman Lemke has had on the Speaker's desk for months a petition asking that we be given a rule under which the Frazier-Lemke farm refinance bill may be brought on the floor of the House for debate. Only 190 Members have signed that petition and 218 are required to bring in the rule, although the House Committee on Agriculture reported the bill favorably.

Some of my colleagues will not sign the petition because they say, "Why, this is a scheme of inflation." It is a scheme to save the farm homes of this Nation and nothing else. If those who want to hold fast to our past methods of financing in this country, when already that system has plunged us in debt to an extent that immediate payment of 50 percent of the debt is a physical impossibility, they will have a sad awakening, when they see farm homes of more than 50 years' standing swept away, under a financial system that has repeatedly performed its nefarious work within our own memories.

Let us take action now—let us do that which must finally be done before a dollar's worth of property is safe within the borders of the United States.

Let us take charge of our own money system, issue sufficient money to do the Nation's business, control the issue by Congress, reduce interest rates, and forcibly wean the private banking interest of the country from collecting annually from the American people an interest burden which they can no longer bear, and which if not stayed will destroy the Government itself.

There are many in this country—and they can be numbered by millions—who believe in the slogan of "Share the wealth of the Nation." They believe the topheavy accumulations of money should be taken away and distributed equitably. What we ask for now is "put a stop to the system that has permitted special privilege to accumulate unconscionable fortunes", while the millions suffer in consequence.

We ask now for an equal opportunity for all. We ask that special privilege be taken away and that every man be given a fair chance to live under our financial system. Here let me note that the opponents of equal opportunities for all and special privilege to none fight this doctrine even more viciously than they do the slogan of "Share the wealth now." If special privilege is so grasping as to not permit a halt in their system, and let the American people have a fair chance, under a financial system open to all, fair to all, just to all, then I say these very ones are the ones who are more responsible than anyone else in bringing about the actual operation of share the wealth now.

We can act in this matter and we can constitutionally act, and I challenge any lawyer or anyone else in this House to maintain that the plan here proposed is unconstitutional.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that as a part of the remarks I made on the floor of the House this afternoon I may be permitted to include therein certain tables I used in that speech.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SISSON, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. UNDERWOOD (at the request of Mr. SECREST), indefinitely, on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

ISIDOR GREENSPAN

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1121) for the relief of Isidor Greenspan, which were, on page 1, line 6, after "$1,500", to insert "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States"; and on page 1, line 11, after "provisions", to insert ": Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

Mr. BARBOUR. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF FEDERAL EMERGENCY RELIEF ADMINISTRATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the Administration covering the period of February 1 to February 28, 1935, inclusive, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Assembly joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to enact bill H. R. 6628, which proposes to provide remunerative employment for the blind citizens of the United States and its possessions, and urging the Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives to expedite consideration favorable to said bill

Whereas during recent times there has been a great deal of public interest and discussion on the part of social and welfare organizations and individuals throughout the United States of the necessity to enact immediate legislation for the purpose of providing remunerative employment for the blind citizens in the United States; and

Whereas in recent years it has become clear to all workers for the amelioration of the condition of the blind that the blind problem is essentially an economic problem which can be solved only through remunerative employment; and

Whereas on March 12, 1935, there was introduced in the House of Representatives by JOHN H. TOLAN, of California, a bill known as "H. R. 6628", which has as its purpose "to provide blind citizens of the United States with remunerative employment, to enlarge economic opportunities of the blind, and to stimulate the blind to greater efforts in striving to render themselves self-supporting"; and

Whereas the Tolan bill, H. R. 6628, is general in its application and seeks to provide employment for all blind citizens who are between 21 and 50 years of age: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the President and Congress of the United States are respectfully urged to enact legislation proposed by bill H. R. 6628, and that the Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives is also urged to expedite consideration favorable to said bill; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Chairman of the Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives, and to each member of the Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that such Senators and Members from California are hereby respectfully urged to support such legislation.

EDWARD CRAIG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
GEO. J. HATFIELD,
President of the Senate.

Attest:
[SEAL] FRANK C. JORDAN,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Assembly Joint Resolution 64

Assembly joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and Congress of the United States to make amends to those disabled war veterans who have been deprived of their just and lawful compensation

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States has rendered a decision declaring unconstitutional certain national legislation providing for the establishment of codes of fair competition; and

Whereas similar legislation has deprived many disabled war veterans of the United States of their just and lawful compensation which in the light of this decision may also be proven to be equally unconstitutional: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the President and the Congress of the United States is hereby memorialized to make immediate and complete restitution of all deductions heretofore made from the legal and established compensation of our disabled war veterans in accordance with certain legislation and Executive orders pursuant thereto, which legislation in the light of a recent decision of the United States Supreme Court is clearly indicated to be unconstitutional; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to forward a copy of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the annual convention of the New York State Bankers Association, endorsing certain suggested amendments, recommended by the committee on Federal legislation of that association, to be proposed to the so-called "Banking Act of 1935", which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the annual convention of the New York State Bankers Association, protesting against the enactment of the so-called "Wheeler-Rayburn public-utility bill", which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the annual convention of the New York State Bankers Association, favoring amendment of the so-called "Social Security Act of 1935", exempting private pension plans, and employers and employees participating therein, from the requirements of the proposed law in instances where such plans meet with the standards and approval of the social-security board provided for in the bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the executive council of the Rochester (N. Y.) Chapter of the Federation of Architects, Engineers, Chemists, and Technicians, protesting against the adoption of the entire proposed wage scale in connection with the Federal work-relief program, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented resolutions adopted by a general meeting of the New York Society of Accountants, New York City, N. Y., protesting against the enactment of the bill (S. 2944) to prevent and make unlawful the practice of law before Government departments, bureaus, commissions, and their agencies by those other than duly licensed attorneys at law, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRELIMINARY REPORT ON OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS (REPT. NO. 898)

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, from the Special Committee to Investigate Air and Ocean Mail Contracts, I ask unanimous consent to present a preliminary report with reference to ocean mail contracts. I may say that the report is signed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and myself, the Senator from Utah making a special explanation with reference to his signature to the report, and that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] did not sign the report, and reserved the right to file minority views if they should see fit hereafter to do so.

In this connection I desire to call attention to two corrections in the committee print of this preliminary report which was distributed yesterday. On page 26, about the middle of the page, with reference to the salary and bonus of Mr. P. A. S. Franklin, the figures appear as $13,900 per year. That was a printer's mistake. The original report shows the correct figures to be $139,000 per year.

And on page 41, at the end of the italicized portion, near the bottom of the page there should be stricken out a clause which appears to be a recommendation for a Government subsidy. The words "the operation to be subsidized where this is proved necessary" should be stricken out, and a period inserted after the words "private operation."

I ask permission to file this report for the benefit of the Senate in connection with proposed legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be received and printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Special Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources, to which was referred the bill (S. 2990) to preserve from extinction the American eagle, emblem of the sovereignty of the United States of America, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 899) thereon.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2203) to promote the development of Indian arts and crafts and to create a board to assist therein, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 900) thereon.

JOHN MONROE JOHNSON

Mr. COPELAND. As in executive session, from the Committee on Commerce, I report the nomination of John Monroe Johnson, of South Carolina, to be Assistant Secretary of Commerce, for the Executive Calendar.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I object to receiving the report at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan objects.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LOGAN:

A bill (S. 3080) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of John W. Hubbard; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3096) to provide funds for cooperation with Porcupine School District, Sioux County, N. Dak., for extension of public-school buildings to be available for Indian children; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 324) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT TO MERCHANT MARINE BILL

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2582) to develop a strong American merchant marine, to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid national defense, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF REVENUE ACT OF 1932—EGGS AND EGG PRODUCTS

Mr. STEIWER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 324) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

FLAG DAY ADDRESS BY SENATOR O'MAHONEY

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender a speech delivered by the able Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] on the steps of the Capitol on June 14 last at the Flag Day exercises of the Grand Army of the Republic and the Women's Relief Corps. The title of the address is "To What Purpose was the Union Saved?" It discusses the important features of government today, and is very informative. I ask that it be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We assemble today not only to give expression to the patriotic sentiments which all Americans bear toward the flag of this Republic, but to pay our tribute to the services of the devoted men and women in and out of the armed forces of our country who preserved the Union.

It is important in this new crisis of our country's affairs that we should take advantage of an occasion of this kind to analyze the fundamental issue in defense of which the members of the Union forces offered their lives.

If we properly understand the principles for which they fought and for which so many of them died, we shall more readily see the course which we should now follow.

LINCOLN SAVED THE UNION

The whole world honors Lincoln for one thing: He saved the Union. We admire him for his ability. We honor him for his patience. We respect him for his character, but we love him because he saved the Union as an instrumentality of freedom for all the peoples of the world.

When you visit that most beautiful of all memorials, which a grateful Nation has erected to his memory upon the banks of the Potomac River, you will find inscribed upon its wall above the heroic figure of the great statesman the statement that the memorial was raised to his memory because, through his leadership, the Union was preserved.

Those who participated in the great Civil War were moved by many purposes. Some thought the struggle was waged for one objective and some for another, but in Lincoln's mind there was never any doubt as to the meaning of the combat. There was only one reason why he was willing to see the fraternal blood of American citizens spilled upon our own soil. That was his conviction that unless the Union were saved human liberty would perish from the face of the earth.

It was not for the freedom of the slaves that he waged that war. He made that clear in one of the most eloquent and effective replies ever made by a President to his detractors.

You will recall that in the summer of 1862 the tide of criticism was running high against the President because he had not yet freed the slaves. This criticism reached its peak in a bitter editorial from the pen of Horace Greeley, then the leading publicist of the country. It became necessary for Lincoln to reply, and in an open letter to the great editor he defined his position in a manner that could not be misunderstood.

THE OPEN LETTER TO GREELEY

"I would save the Union," he wrote. "If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time save slavery, I do not agree with them. If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time destroy slavery, I do not agree with them. My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union and is not either to save or destroy salvery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the colored race I do because I believe it helps to save the Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union. I shall do less whenever I shall believe what I am doing hurts the cause, and I shall do more whenever I shall believe doing more will help the cause."

The Union was saved because Abraham Lincoln was able to see through the superficial aspect of things and understand fundamentals. Though he hated slavery, he was willing to tolerate it if by so doing he could save the Union, because he had faith that through the instrumentality of that Union the blessings of liberty would be preserved, not for us alone, but for all the peoples of the world.

Slavery passed. The wounds of war were bound, and all have been healed. The Union remains. To what purpose was it preserved?

We shall fail to measure up to the standards of the founders and of the saviors of our Union, and we shall be unworthy of the sacrifice that they made, unless, like Lincoln, we are also able to see through the superficial aspect of the issues of this hour to the fundamentals by which they must be decided if human liberty is to endure.

THE GETTYSBURG ADDRESS

Every citizen of the United States—young and old, man or woman—should read anew the immortal address that Lincoln delivered upon the battlefield of Gettysburg; for there, within the compass of a few hundred words, he expressed the very heart and soul of Americanism. Surely there is no spot in all this land more fitted for the reading of that speech than here upon the steps of the Capitol of the Union which its author saved:

"Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

"Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that the Nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

"But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecreated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

AMERICA MUST REMAIN A PEOPLE'S GOVERNMENT

Let no one forget that we are in truth "a Nation conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." Let no one ever doubt that America is and must remain "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

These are not platitudes. They are the vital principles that Jefferson wrote into the Declaration of Independence, that the framers of the Constitution wrote into the very preamble of that instrument and to which Lincoln summoned the people to rededicate themselves in the immortal address we have just re-read.

Lincoln believed in the common people. He believed that this Government was founded to preserve their inherent liberties. He believed that without the Union free government would disappear from the face of the earth and that mankind everywhere would once again become the prey of exploitation and oppression. And so he bent every faculty of his being to the accomplishment of a single objective, the preservation of the Union.

All the pages of history tell the story of the progress of humanity toward freedom—freedom from the bondage of thought, freedom from the bondage of political power, and now, freedom from economic bondage. Every major struggle that has been waged has been a struggle between those on the one hand who sought to subjugate or exploit their fellows, and those, on the other, who resisted conquest and exploitation. Every step of progress achieved by mankind has been won through the efforts of those who fought for the liberation of the masses from the domination of self-constituted masters. We shall be insensible not only to our history and to the heritage bequeathed to us by Lincoln and the men who waged the war in defense of the Union, but we shall be insensible as well to the opportunity which is presented to us today if we fail to understand that greed and power in the hearts and hands of those who seek to control our economic destinies are threatening the principles that Lincoln so eloquently expounded. The modern battle for economic freedom will be half won when we fully recognize it as only a phase of the age-old conflict, for the aspirations of the American people remain the same today as they were in the beginning.

The historic theory of human freedom which made this country great and which made it the hope of the world now faces its supreme test, a test that will be the more difficult because the issue has been so terribly confused by loose thinking. The cry of constitutional government has been raised by many sincere and honest men thinking that they were defending the individual citizen against the encroachments of a too-ambitious central government.

Let us make no mistake about this: the modern conflict in this land of ours is not between the individual citizen on the one hand and the Federal Government on the other. It is a conflict between the Federal Government as the defender of individual liberty against an industrial and commercial despotism which knows neither State rights nor human rights, and which, dominating the economic life of the Nation, has been slowly undermining the liberties of the people.

THE CONSTITUTION A CHARTER OF LIBERTY

Lincoln saved the Union for the task that must be performed in this hour. Do not be deceived. The Constitution of the United States is a charter of human liberty. It is not and never was intended to be a shield for corporate monopoly. Those who would now use it as an instrument for preventing the Federal Government from effectively regulating the huge economic units which span the country without respect to State lines are forgetting that the Constitution was ordained "to promote the general welfare and to secure the blessings of liberty" to the people, that it was framed to make effective a government of the people.

Most of the political and economic difficulties from which our country is now suffering have resulted from the fact that we have forgotten the distinction between natural persons and artificial persons created by the States, which are called corporations. Thomas Jefferson was not thinking about corporations when he wrote "that all men are created equal." The framers of the Constitution were not thinking about corporations when they wrote the preamble. Abraham Lincoln was not thinking about corporations when he delivered the Gettysburg Address and when he went into the valley of death to preserve the Union. They were all thinking about people—about men and women of flesh and blood and of their human rights.

Political institutions have not kept pace with our commercial and economic development. An airplane spans the continent before the sun can circle the globe. In the twinkling of an eye the human voice vibrates over a telephone wire from New York to San Francisco, and on the waves of ether, through the radio it reaches beyond the boundaries of imagination. In the industrial and commercial world State lines have practically disappeared, but all these wonderful powers which have been released by science and invention for the service of mankind have been controlled through the corporate form for private rather than for public good.

ECONOMIC FREEDOM, OUR NEXT STEP

The huge corporations which carry on the great bulk of our commerce and industry are too large to be regulated by the separate States. The Federal Government, the Union, is the only agency of the people that is powerful enough to cope with them.

Do not misunderstand me as opposing all corporations. They have served a very necessary and useful purpose. The natural progress of our times could scarcely have been achieved without them, but they are the servants, not the masters of mankind. Our task is to make certain that they shall continue to be the servants of the people.

The concentration of wealth in this country has gone hand in hand with the multiplication of the corporations. The unimagined wealth of the Nation has literally poured into the hands of a few, not because we have lacked the will to prevent monopoly, but because, somehow, our leaders have been too weak to act. Because we have been too jealous of State rights we have placed human rights in jeopardy by permitting some of the States to charter corporations with unconscionable powers to prey upon the people, corporations that are managed neither by their stockholders nor their employees and are regulated neither by the States nor by the Nation. Administrations may come and administrations may go, but there will be no complete restoration of prosperity and happiness until we have found the way of liberating the people of America from corporate exploitation. We must take control of our own economic destinies.

The Federal Union is the instrumentality through which that objective will be attained. It was dedicated by its founders "to the proposition that all men are created equal." It was preserved by men who dedicated themselves anew to that principle. In this hour of crisis only a rededication to human rights will enable it to achieve the purposes of freedom for which it was created and for which it was saved.

SOCIAL SECURITY

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 7260) to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment-compensation laws; to establish a Social Security Board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Missouri last evening, as the RECORD shows, asked permission to offer certain amendments to be considered as one amendment and to have them pending. The Chair considers those amendments to be pending, unless the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] calls up a committee amendment which was passed over, as under the unanimous-consent agreement committee amendments were first to be considered.

Mr. HARRISON. It is perfectly agreeable that the amendments of the Senator from Missouri be considered at this time.

Mr. CLARK obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I simply desired to know what was pending; that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendments offered by the Senator from Missouri at the conclusion of the session last evening.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask that the amendments be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, after line 25, it is proposed to add the following new paragraph:

(7) Service performed in the employ of an employer who has in operation a plan providing annuities to employees which is certified by the board as having been approved by it under section 702, if the employee performing such service has elected to come under such plan; except that if any such employee withdraws from the plan before he attains the age of 65, or if the board withdraws its approval of the plan, the service performed while the employee was under such plan as approved shall be construed to be employment as defined in this subsection.

On page 43, lines 17 and 18, add the following new paragraphs:

(b) The board shall receive applications from employers who desire to operate private annuity plans with a view to providing benefits in lieu of the benefits otherwise provided for in title II of this act, and the board shall approve any such plan and issue a certificate of such approval if it finds that such plan meets the following requirements:

(1) The plan shall be available, without limitation as to age, to any employee who elects to come under such plan.

(2) The benefits payable at retirement and the conditions as to retirement shall not be less favorable, based upon accepted actuarial principles, than those provided for under section 202.

(3) The contributions of the employee and the employer shall be deposited with a life-insurance company, an annuity organization, or a trustee approved by the board.

(4) Termination of employment shall constitute withdrawal from the plan.

(5) Upon the death of an employee, his estate shall receive an amount not less than the amount it would have received if the employee had been entitled to receive benefits under title II of this act.

(c) The board shall have the right to call for such reports from the employer and to make such inspections of his records as will satisfy it that the requirements of subsection (b) are being met, and to make such regulations as will facilitate the operation of such private annuity plans in conformity with such requirements.

(d) The board shall withdraw its approval of any such plan upon the request of the employer, or if it finds that the plan or any action taken thereunder fails to meet the requirements of subsection (b).

On page 52, after line 7, add the following new paragraph:

(7) Service performed by an employee before he attains the age of 65 in the employ of an employer who has in operation a plan providing annuities to employees which is certified by the board as having been approved by it under section 702, if the employee has elected to come under such plan, and if the Commissioner of Internal Revenue determines that the aggregate annual contributions of the employee and the employer under such plan as approved are not less than the taxes which would otherwise be payable under sections 801 and 804, and that the employer pays an amount at least equal to 50 percent of such taxes: Provided, That if any such employee withdraws from the plan before he attains the age of 65, or if the board withdraws its approval of the plan, there shall be paid by the employer to the Treasurer of the United States, in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, an amount equal to the taxes which would otherwise have been payable by the employer and the employee on account of such service, together with interest on such amount at 3 percent per annum compounded annually.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my amendments may be considered as one amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, while it has been necessary to propose amendments to various sections in the bill, the amendments essentially comprise but one amendment. The purpose may be very briefly stated. The purpose of the amendment is to permit companies which have or may establish private pension plans, which are at least equally favorable or more favorable to the employee than the plan set up under the provisions of the bill as a Government plan, to be exempted from the provisions of the bill and to continue the operation of the private plan provided it meets the requirements of the amendment and is approved by the board set up by the bill itself.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would the Senator's amendment exempt such corporations from paying the tax?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; to the extent of the requirements of the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. If under the Senator's plan a company should qualify under his amendment, there would be no payroll tax on the company or the employees, I understand.

Mr. CLARK. Insofar as this title is regarded, that would be true; but the amendment requires that the employer shall pay into the private pension fund, under conditions approved by the board, not less than the amount of the taxes which would otherwise be paid under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. In connection with the statement the Senator is now making, on page 3 of the amendment, I find the following language:

And if the Commissioner of Internal Revenue determines that the aggregate annual contributions of the employee and the employer under such plan as approved are not less than the taxes which would otherwise be payable under sections 801 and 804, and that the employer pays an amount at least equal to 50 percent of such taxes.

Will the Senator explain the meaning of the last clause, "that the employer pays an amount at least equal to 50 percent of such taxes", in view of the requirement that the annual contribution under such plan, when approved, shall be "not less than the taxes which would otherwise be payable"?

Mr. CLARK. Some of the plans require diversified contributions by employer and employee. It is provided further that the amount of the contribution shall be not less than the taxes to be paid as provided in the pending bill, and further, there is a requirement for the purpose of insuring that no employer can gain anything financially by remaining under a private pension plan or going under a private pension plan. To that end a provision is inserted that he shall pay not less than 50 percent of the joint contribution. No employer shall, under the exemption granted by the amendment, be permitted to pay into the private pension fund, as a minimum, less than the amount of the taxes he would have to pay under the bill. That is the whole purpose of the amendment.

Provision is made as fully and adequately, in my judgment, as it is possible to make provision to cover the purposes intended; and the amendment has been recast since it was offered in the committee for the purpose of meeting objections made in the committee. It is provided on page 2:

The board shall receive applications—

That is, the board set up under the bill, and no one may have exemption unless his plan meets the requirements of the amendment and is approved by the board itself.

(b) The board shall receive applications from employers who desire to operate private annuity plans with a view to providing benefits in lieu of the benefits otherwise provided for in title II of this act, and the board shall approve any such plan and issue a certificate of such approval if it finds that such plan meets the following requirement:

(1) The plan shall be available, without limitation as to age, to any employee who elects to come under such plan.

Of course, the exemption does not provide for forcing under the operation of the plan any employee who would prefer to remain under the Government plan.

(2) The benefits payable at retirement and the conditions as to retirement shall not be less favorable, based upon accepted actuarial principles, than those provided for under section 202.

In other words, it remains for the board, set up under the bill to administer the Government pension plan, to determine in each case and make an affirmative requirement; and the board shall find, before they grant the exemption, that the benefits to the employee under the private pension plan are not less favorable, based upon accepted actuarial principles, than those provided under the Government pension plan.

3. The contributions of the employee and the employer shall be deposited with a life-insurance company, an annuity organization, or a trustee approved by the board.

This puts in the hands of the board itself the security of these funds and insures that no possible failure on the part of the employer may jeopardize the interests which the employees acquire. It puts it in the hands of the board to make requirement for that security.

4. Termination of employment shall constitute withdrawal from the plan.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May I ask the Senator from Missouri if he does not believe that there is a possibility, at least, that clause (4) would allow an employer to terminate the employment and thereby defeat the plan?

Mr. CLARK. I will say that, in my judgment, that is completely guarded against—although I shall be very glad to accept a further amendment to make it more certain—by later language in the amendment which provides that upon termination of employment—

There shall be paid by the employer to the Treasurer of the United States, in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, an amount equal to the taxes which would otherwise have been payable by the employer and the employee on account of such service, together with interest on such amount at 3 percent per annum, compounded annually.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Would the Senator accept an amendment by which the word "voluntary" should be inserted before the word "termination"?

Mr. CLARK. I should be glad to accept the amendment. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that the termination under this plan should be from any cause, either by discharge of the employee or by the withdrawal of the employee, provided it is made certain that at such time the employee should pay into the Government fund the amount which would have accrued by taxes, plus 3 percent compounded annually. That is the theory of the amendment. I am willing to accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in that connection, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The mere insertion of the word "voluntary", so that it would read "voluntary termination of employment", unless we should put in "on the part of the employee", might mean the voluntary termination of it by the employer.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator from Wyoming will permit me, if he will examine the amendment carefully, I think he will find that the theory of the amendment is that whenever the employment is terminated from any cause whatever, at that moment the employee shall have the right, as already provided, to have paid into the Government fund from the private pension fund the amount of taxes which would have been paid in from the beginning of his employment, plus 3 percent compounded annually, which is exactly the basis of the Government plan. In other words, the theory is that whenever the employee from any cause goes off the private pension plan, he shall automatically be entitled to take his place in the Government plan with the same benefits that would have been there if he had been under the Government plan all the time.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course, this is the first opportunity many of us have had to examine the amendment, and I have just been following the Senator as he proceeded through it. I believe the amendment should be studied carefully before acting upon it.

Mr. CLARK. I shall be very glad to have any suggestions from the Senator. The amendment has been carefully gone over by the legislative drafting service in order to meet the objections which were made in the committee. I believe it to be comprehensive. I had the amendment printed several days ago, and have urged many Senators to take the trouble to examine it, and if there are any suggestions on the part of any Senator for the purpose of making abundantly clear the purposes of the amendment, I shall be very glad indeed to have them brought forward.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. Referring to the first requirement, the Senator's amendment provides:

The plan shall be available, without limitation as to age, to any employee who elects to come under such plan.

Does the Senator interpret that to mean that any employee, if he elects to join this plan, may join it—in other words, that the employer is compelled to accept as a member of the plan any employee who elects to become a member of it?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. It seems to me that the language is not subject to the interpretation given it by the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me it is. If the Senator from New York has any suggestions, I shall be very glad to have them.

Mr. WAGNER. The language of the amendment is:

The plan shall be available, without limitation as to age, to any employee who elects to come under such plan.

That is, the employer cannot compel an employee to become a member of the plan.

Mr. CLARK. That is not intended.

Mr. WAGNER. But, at the same time, there is nothing in the amendment which will prohibit an employer from declining to accept the employee.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if this language is not clear, I shall be very glad if the Senator from New York will suggest some amendment to make it clear, because I personally should be unable to frame it in any clearer language.

The plan shall be available without limitation—

The last clause prohibits any employer from shutting out, on the ground of age, any of his employees who wish to come under it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Louisiana in a moment.

The plan shall be available, without limitation as to age, to any employee who elects to come under such plan.

I do not know how to make that any clearer. If the Senator from New York can suggest some way of clarifying it, I shall be glad to have him do it.

Mr. WAGNER. There is nothing in the amendment which requires the employer, if that election takes place, to accept it. He may decline to do so.

Mr. CLARK. The amendment says:

The plan shall be available * * * to any employee who elects to come under such plan.

Mr. WAGNER. "Elects"—yes.

Mr. CLARK. I shall be glad to accept any amendment to the effect that the employer must accept any employee who desires to come in, because that certainly is the intention of the language. I think the language is perfectly clear, but I shall be very glad to accept an amendment to that effect, which I will prepare a little later.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Is this the amendment about which I have been getting some letters from employees of oil refineries? Is this to take care of them?

Mr. CLARK. I dare say it is. I have had a great many letters from employees and a great many letters from employers. Some of the oil companies—notably the Standard Oil Co. of California, the Socony-Vacuum Co. of New York, I believe the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, and a great number of companies—have voluntary pension plans.

Mr. LONG. This amendment protects them in what they already have?

Mr. CLARK. This amendment is for the purpose of protecting them in their rights.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would not this amendment, if adopted, subject the whole measure to the possibility of creating a competitive situation between the Government and private annuity or insurance companies, so that a lot of high-pressure salesmanship would be brought to bear on employers by private companies to adopt a private system in competition with the national system?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I do not think it would; and if the high-pressure salesmanship led to employers extending more generous treatment to their employees, I do not see that there would be any disadvantage to anybody if that were the result.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me ask the Senator another question. Would not the employer be permitted or induced to discriminate as between younger employees and older employees, so that the older ones might be shunted off on the Government, while the younger ones were taken care of by the private plan?

Mr. CLARK. That objection was raised before the committee, and the amendment was redrawn and the provision added that the payment of the employer shall not be less than the amount of tax for the specific purpose of meeting that objection; so there is no possible way, under the amendment as now drawn, by which any employer can profit to the extent of a single penny, in any manner, by going on a private pension plan rather than on the Government pension plan.

Of course, the suggestion originally arose in connection with such companies as the Ford Motor Co. and the Goodyear company. The suggestion was made that when they had limitations as to the ages of their employees, or refused to employ men over 35 or 40 years old, to allow them to have private pension plans was to put a premium on such conduct. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, of course, everybody knows that nearly all the companies which have age limits as to their employees are companies, like the Ford Motor Co., which manufacture on a line which requires each employee to perform a certain operation at a certain time, and a slowing up of one employee slows up the whole operation. In other words, it is like a ball player's legs giving out on him and slowing up the whole baseball team. The purpose of that requirement in such companies as that has nothing to do with any pension plan, but is simply because the younger employees are more efficient in the line operation.

For the purpose of meeting such an objection as that, however, a provision was inserted in this amendment as redrawn, and as now before the Senate, which provides that the employer must in every case pay into the private pension fund, and to the reserve set up under the private pension fund, an amount not less than the amount of the tax, so that it is impossible for him to profit in any way by going under a private pension system.

Furthermore, if, as suggested before the committee, there is any advantage to the employer in being able to insure more cheaply because of the average younger age of his employees by reason of this age-limit requirement, under the amendment the only person who could benefit by such cheaper rate would be the employee.

In other words, if the employer under the provisions of the Government pension scheme should be required to pay in $300 a year, he would still be required to pay in a minimum of $300 a year under the private pension scheme, because that is specifically set forth in the amendment. The only advantage which could come to anybody would be, in such a situation, if there were lower rates of insurance on account of the younger age of the employees, that the employer in paying the $300 into the private pension fund would be able to buy a larger annuity for his employee than he otherwise would under the Government pension scheme. That would be the only possible advantage.

Mr. President, it was said before the committee, and was said again in the Senate the other day by the distinguished chairman of the committee, that there are in fact no private pension plans which are more favorable to the employee than the Government pension plan provided for in the bill. I do not desire to go into great detail on that matter. I simply desire to point out that while I freely admit that there are private pension plans now in existence which are not as favorable to the employee as the Government pension plan, which class of private pension plans would not come within the purview of the exemption set up in the amendment, there are a great number of private pension plans which are vastly more favorable to the employee in many particulars. For instance, some private pension plans now in existence—many of them, in fact—provide for an earlier retirement age for women than for men. The bill makes no distinction between the retirement age for men and for women under the Government pension plan; and yet it is almost universally agreed among doctors and sociologists that in any pension scheme a distinction should be made between the retirement age for men and for women, because in the wear and tear of industry it is very desirable that women should be retired earlier than men.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that the large institutions in my home city called the "packing companies" inform me that they have long had in existence their own private systems; and, if I may be forgiven a personal touch, while for a little while acting mayor of that city—previously the corporation counsel—we sought to inaugurate a joint city concern with that of the packing interests, which did not succeed. The packing companies feel, however, that their own plan has been a very great success; and there is presented, I may say to the Senator, a joint paper on the subject signed by a certain number of their employees. What proportion the number bears to the whole of their employees I do not know. I ask the Senator, is there anything in his amendment or in the bill which would prevent these concerns from dropping their private arrangement and coming into the Federal bill at a later time if they chose to do so?

Mr. CLARK. There is not. There is specifically provided in the amendment, I will say to the Senator from Illinois, the completest freedom of action. In other words, an employee would be permitted to withdraw from the system at any time he chose and to take into the Federal system with him the amount which would have been there if he had been under the Federal system all the time. The board not only has the right but it is the duty of the board, at any time all of the conditions provided for in the amendment are not complied with, to withdraw the exemption and force the employer and the employee into the Government pension system.

Under the amendment the employer has the right, if he finds he cannot go on with the private pension plan, to withdraw his application for exemption, at which time the whole concern passes under the Government plan, with every right secured to the employees that would have been theirs if they had been under the plan all the time.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I understand the able Senator to say that if the amendment should be agreed to and the private concerns continue as they are, should anything arise as between the employers and the employees, the availability under the general law would be open to them completely, without obstructions?

Mr. CLARK. That is entirely correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator think it is in the interest of efficient administration to have some of the employees of any employer under a private annuity system and other employees of the same employer under the Government system?

Mr. CLARK. That might be a matter of inconvenience to the employer, but if in truth and in fact the private annuity plan were more beneficial to the employee, I think there would be very little danger that the employees would not desire to be under the private plan. On the other hand, if it were not more beneficial, then there would be very little doubt that all the employees would desire to be under the Government plan.

Mr. BARKLEY. In any case, would not the Government be under an obligation to carry on inspections to determine whether or not the plan was as favorable as that of the Government?

Mr. CLARK. There is so much inspection and so much administrative overhead machinery provided for in the bill that it is impossible for me to believe that a few more Government employees in the administrative section would make much difference.

Mr. BARKLEY. One more question, although I do not like to take the Senator's time.

The Senator will recall that we attempted to eliminate child labor, first, by prohibition against the shipment in interstate commerce of products of child labor, which was declared unconstitutional. Then we tried to reach it by taxation, and the Supreme Court held that unconstitutional in part on the ground that it was a penalty assessed against those who did indulge in child labor. Under the pending amendment, as I understand it, those who adopt the private system are exempt from the tax that is levied generally for the support of the Government system. Does the Senator think that lays the bill open to the constitutional objection, on the ground that it penalizes those who do not have a private insurance plan as compared with those who have, and that that might endanger the bill on the question of constitutionality?

Mr. CLARK. The constitutionality of the proposed act is already so doubtful that it would seem to me to be a work of supererogation to bring up the question of constitutionality in regard to the pending amendment. Let me say to the Senator, to answer more seriously, that if the question of constitutionality is involved in regard to the matter he has suggested, it is already in the bill under the amendment in title IX offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and adopted by the Senate, making certain exemptions in the case of employees' pensions. In other words, the distinction, while not identical, is in principle the same.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment to which the Senator refers deals with a different subject.

Mr. CLARK. Of course it deals with a different subject; in other words, it deals with an exemption for the purpose of allowing the State of Wisconsin to continue its own State system without interference.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I wish to say that, as the Senator from Kentucky very appropriately pointed out, on the basis of the complete analysis he has made, the bill is unconstitutional. The private pension system is the thing which the Government could afford to encourage.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator made reference to exemptions already incorporated in the bill.

Mr. CLARK. That is in a different title, I will say to the Senator from Idaho. That is under unemployment insurance, in title IX.

Mr. BORAH. The bill does not cover all employees in all lines of industry or avocation, does it?

Mr. CLARK. It does not. I take it for granted that it is an undoubted constitutional principle that the matter of classification is a matter for the legislature rather than the courts. The bill specifically exempts large classes from its operation. For instance, it exempts agricultural classes, and exempts Government employees, one of the largest classes of employees in the country, I assume for the reason that the Congress recognizes, in considering this bill, that the Government already has in effect, in its capacity as employer, a pension system more beneficial to the employees than the one set up in the bill for the general run of industry. As the Senator has suggested, there are large classes of the population who are already excluded or exempted from the operation of the proposed law.

Mr. BORAH. May not the Congress make any classification it desires, so long as it is not purely arbitrary or capricious? If there is any foundation for a difference of classification, the Congress can make it.

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me there cannot be any question of that as a legal proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. CLARK. I reserve the balance of my time, then.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a few days ago I received a very interesting letter from Mr. H. W. Forster, vice president of an insurance company of Philadelphia, setting forth some of the advantages embodied in the proposal made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. Having that in mind, I ask unanimous consent to have the clerk read the reasons set forth in the letter in support of the amendment. It is very brief, comprising but one page.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

REASONS IN SUPPORT OF AN AMENDMENT PERMITTING PRIVATE ANNUITY PLANS UNDER SOCIAL SECURITY BILL (H. R. 7260)

ADVANTAGES TO EMPLOYEES

1. More liberal annuities.
2. Credit for past service.
3. Protection for employees now on pension.
4. Employees age 60 and over are covered.
5. Annuities in true proportion to earnings and service.
6. Joint annuities, so as to protect wives also.
7. Earlier retirements for women.
8. Earlier retirements for disability or other reasons.
9. Annuities, not cash, for withdrawing employees.

ADVANTAGES TO EMPLOYERS

10. They need and want the more adequate annuities provided by private plans, with recognition of past service.
11. They know that it is not feasible to impose on all employers any heavier burden than the bill contemplates, but more liberal plans are desired by many who can afford to carry them.
12. Private plans take adequate care of older employees, their most pressing problem.

ADVANTAGES TO THE GOVERNMENT

13. Relief from deficits due to unearned annuities.
14. Reserves of private annuity plans flow into business channels.
15. Private plans will absorb part of the burden on other portions of the social-security program.
16. Private plans will relieve the Social Security Board of a vast amount of detail.

SAFETY OF PRIVATE PLANS

17. Past record of properly financed plans, and the future outlook, show only security for properly safeguarded private plans.

THE "SUPPLEMENTARY PLAN" IDEA

18. Theoretically appealing, but not practically workable and certainly not productive of liberal guaranteed annuities for employees.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] not only upon the grounds stated in the presentation made and in the document just read from the desk, but also because there is very grave doubt of the constitutionality of the bill as it stands. I do not believe that any lawyer of experience would assert that the bill is free from constitutional question. I do not wish to expand the constitutional argument, because the Senate is not in receptive mood, but the bill undertakes to impose a tax upon specific employers. The beneficiaries of the tax are a special class, it is disclosed in the hearings, and it is disclosed in the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury at one time for an alteration in the tax rate itself, showing that the only purpose of the bill is to set up a system of old-age annuity and unemployment insurance by the use of the taxing power, and by the creation of the annuity system and the old-age employment insurance system.

I direct the attention of the Senate to the fact that the bill is not a grant in aid to the States. That is true as to title II, portions of title III and title VIII of the bill, the taxing title, and part of title IX, which also covers taxing provisions. It is not a grant in aid of the States, but it does undertake, by the use of the power to appropriate money out of the General Treasury, to apply the money so appropriated to the establishment of the old-age-annuity and unemployment-insurance systems, under which the beneficiaries are the identical employees of the taxed employers, and under which the taxing provisions of this bill undoubtedly are tied in with the titles establishing the old-age annuity and the unemployment-insurance provision.

I also direct attention to the salient and important fact that under title II of this bill and a part of title III of the bill rights enforceable at law are granted to private citizens, irrespective of the character of their employment, irrespective of the character of the industry in which employed, in every State in the Union; and that, in my judgmen, clearly shows that an effort is here made to establish a system which does not lie within the powers granted to the Congress, but which have been definitely reserved to the States under the reserved rights and powers of the States.

Even the preamble of the bill shows unmistakably that the taxing power is invoked for the purpose of setting up old-age annuity and unemployment insurance.

Mr. President, I know that the courts will go a long way to uphold the power of Congress to appropriate; and I am not going to controvert that. I also know that the courts will go a long way to sustain legislation of this character, and I think they should. But if the court looks through mere form to the substance of this bill, I assert again that the question of the validity of the bill is one which no responsible lawyer would undertake to say is not in serious question. Hence, why strike down, with the probably unconstitutional bill, the private pension systems and private benefit systems granting benefits to the employees of employers of this country, some 450 in number, embracing a large part of our population—why strike those down when a bill is proposed which probably will not pass the muster of the courts?

Let me say that it was argued in committee that the private pension systems might still be maintained. I submit as a matter of plain common sense that the private systems will not, in fact, be maintained if the employers are subjected to a tax which they must in any event pay for the purpose of setting up an exactly similar system, or a system that has for its objectives the same general purpose.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Conscious as I am that the able Senator from Georgia occupied a high place on the bench, and, therefore, that the subject he is now discussing is not one to be called primary with him, I should like his judgment on one matter. How far does he feel that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the tax feature to which he alludes, in the cause which came up from North Carolina where the question of tax was assumed to be the motive in the case of protecting child labor—how far does he feel that that opinion supports the viewpoint he has uttered here today respecting the doubtful features of the tax provisions of this bill?

Mr. GEORGE. In reply to the distinguished Senator from Illinois, I would not say that the child-labor taxing decision is strictly applicable to this case, except in point of principle. In that case the act itself carried upon its face the disclosure of the real purpose of imposing the tax; and the Supreme Court, of course, said that the object was not that of raising revenue.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to read to him some language from the case of United States against Doremus, Two Hundred and Forty-ninth United States Reports, page 86, involving the Harrison Narcotic Act, in which the question was whether a bill which contained a taxing feature could also accomplish some other purpose in addition to that of merely levying a tax? The Court said:

> An act may not be declared unconstitutional because its effect may be to accomplish another purpose as well as the raising of revenue. If the legislation is within the taxing authority of Congress, it is sufficient to sustain it.

There the act itself had other purposes in addition to levying a tax.

Mr. GEORGE. The decision to which the Senator from New York calls attention would not be controverted by anyone, anywhere.

Mr. WAGNER. I thought the Senator was controverting it.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I am not controverting it. I am trying to make my position clear, and I am saying that we are setting up in this bill a particular old-age annuity and unemployment insurance system under which the individual citizen in any State in the Union acquires an enforceable right; and when he undertakes to enforce it, by what authority has the Congress established it? That is the simple, the necessary, the logical question.

I know that the tax may be imposed if within the taxing power of the Congress, although other objectives may be effected or accomplished through the imposition of the tax; but I also know that it is a sound principle of law that a tax cannot be imposed for a private purpose. It must be public. I also know that as a matter of sound legislation the Congress ought not to set up a scheme under which enforceable rights are given to individuals unless the Congress can relate its legislation to some grant of power.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I absolutely agree, of course, with the Senator from Georgia that we certainly cannot levy a tax for a purely private purpose; but does the Senator contend that the payment of an old-age pension is a private purpose as distinguished from a public purpose?

Mr. GEORGE. I contend that we do not levy this tax nor do we use the proceeds of the appropriation made out of the General Treasury for the purpose of setting up an annuity for all old people in the United States. We have selected classes. I contend also that we have selected the classes which are intimately and inescapably tied in with the employers who are taxed under title VIII and title IX of this bill, and therefore the scheme is palpable and clear to my mind, and that we are imposing the tax for identically the same purpose condemned by the Supreme Court in the railway-retirement decision, aside from the first suggestion that there were inseparable clauses which offended varied provisions of the Constitution; that we could not by compulsion make the industry set up an old-age-pension system.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator several times has referred to the bill, when, as I gather his argument, he intends to limit his constitutional objection to title II.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand the Senator, he concedes fully and completely the right of a State under the Constitution to establish an old-age-pension system.

Mr. GEORGE. Beyond all doubt.

Mr. BLACK. And, therefore, he concedes the right of the Federal Government to aid that State by Federal grants in aid, under such conditions as it sees fit.

Mr. GEORGE. I do; and I should have been most enthusiastic in my support of the bill had this particular part of the bill been dealt with in that way—that is, through grants in aid to the States.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand further, the Senator's objection on the constitutional ground is that instead of permitting the State—which he says does have the power to set up a system—to set up that system, in title II the Federal Government sets up an old-age-pension system; and the Senator from Georgia is of the opinion that the Federal Government does not have that power under the Constitution?

Mr. GEORGE. I am of that opinion, because I can find in the Constitution no provision which grants that power. This is clearly, as I think, among the reserved powers of the State.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not wish to annoy the Senator with my interruptions.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I am not quite clear as to one of the Senator's contentions. Does the Senator contend that, because of the decision in the Railway Pension Act, we are powerless to enact a law of this character?

Mr. GEORGE. I contend that under that decision the Congress cannot directly say to an industry, "You must set up an old-age-pension system" or "a retirement system"; and I contend further that when the scheme which has been devised is so tied in with the taxing provision as to disclose but one purpose, and that is the purpose of using the general taxing power for the purpose of providing this system only for the beneficiaries who fall within the classification of the employees of the taxed employers, we shall have a legislative act, if the bill shall be passed, which any reasonable lawyer of experience will be bound to say is subject to serious question.

For my purposes, that is all I desire to say, because I am arguing in this instance for the approval of the Clark amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. I understand.

Mr. GEORGE. And I am proceeding upon the theory that Congress ought not, through this legislation, practically to strike down and prevent the expansion of private or company insurance, or annuity plans. The effect of the proposed legislation undoubtedly will be to discourage any further advances of the private pension systems in the United States.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, as I recall, there was not anything in the decision that might even suggest that the establishment of a pension system, providing that the classification is fair, would not be considered a public purpose.

The decision was based on the ground that interstate commerce was not affected by the retirement of old workers. The taxing power was not involved.

Mr. GEORGE. That is very true; the taxing power was not involved, but we cannot, under the compulsion of a tax, make an industry do any more and we ought not at least to undertake to make it do any more than we could do directly. If the scheme is one that can be referred to any legitimate power of the Congress, all well and good; but if it cannot be, and if it is one that must depend rightfully and rightly upon the exercise of the reserved powers of the States, then Congress should not through the compulsion of a tax undertake to compel the adoption of the scheme.

Mr. WAGNER. Then, as I understand the Senator's contention, it is that he doubts whether the establishment by Federal Government of a Federal pension system for a class of workers in this country is a public purpose.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not say that it was not a public purpose.

Mr. WAGNER. I mean the Senator contends that there is a serious question as to whether or not it is a public purpose.

Mr. GEORGE. I said that under this bill there is a serious question as to whether or not it is.

Mr. WAGNER. Is that because of the classification?

Mr. GEORGE. Because the beneficiaries are so restricted and tied in with those who are taxed as to make it, in substance at least, a compulsory system through the use of the taxing power by the Congress.

Mr. WAGNER. In other words, as I understand the Senator's contention, he believes that it would be a safer method if we should tax all the people of the United States, instead of merely taxing the employers of the workers, for the purpose of supporting a pension system.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not regard it as within the power of the Federal Government to set up a pension system for all the people of the United States; I take the contrary view. My philosophy is quite different from that of the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator misunderstood me, I am sure.

Mr. GEORGE. I think that the pensioning of the people of the country is essentially within the reserved powers of the States.

Mr. WAGNER. As a general proposition, I agree with the Senator. I am trying to have clear in my mind the particular objection the Senator raises to the proposed legislation. As I understand, the Senator feels that there is a serious constitutional question involved because we are levying a tax for the payment of pensions upon the employers of the particular workers benefited.

Mr. GEORGE. And the employees, too.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; and the employees, too. Does the Senator feel that we would be on safer ground if we taxed everybody in the United States to pay these particular pensions? I do not know where the Senator got the notion that I ever contended that everybody in the United States ought to have a pension. I never made any such contention.

Mr. GEORGE. I think it would.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If I understand the Senator correctly, he does not raise any constitutional question as to the power of Congress to levy the tax as a tax?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no.

Mr. BARKLEY. The money to go into the Treasury for general governmental purposes.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to qualify my statement. I do not raise any question regarding the power of the Federal Government to make appropriations out of the General Treasury and to levy taxes, of course.

Mr. BARKLEY. Therefore, if the proposed pension system is tied in with the tax, although in an attenuated way, the Senator thinks that the tax, then, is lawful, just as a pure tax would be lawful, and is within the power of Congress?

Mr. GEORGE. I think Congress may impose an excise tax based upon the volume of pay rolls, if that is what the Senator means; but if it is tied in with this particular scheme, as provided in this bill, I question the validity of the tax.

Mr. BARKLEY. Where is the difference, in constitutional principle, between making a lump-sum appropriation out of the Treasury for relief purposes and making an appropriation out of the Treasury for relief purposes by setting up classifications under which relief shall be paid in the form of old-age pensions? I do not quite understand the distinction the Senator makes or how it would raise any constitutional question as to the power of Congress to pay aged people what we call a pension.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator mean to pay them as a mere matter of gratuity?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, not necessarily as a matter of gratuity; but assuming that it were a gratuity——

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator mean to say, if enforcible rights are granted to pensioners generally, that, even if the appropriation is made out of the general funds of the Treasury, no serious question might be raised?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the line of demarcation is so blurred at points that it is always difficult for anybody here to be sure that what he does is constitutional.

Mr. GEORGE. Perhaps I may help the Senator by this observation: I did not undertake to make a constitutional argument; that is not my purpose; my purpose is to point out the doubtful validity of this proposed act and to invite the Senate to permit, under the Clark amendment, the continuance of the plans now in existence if they meet the standards which the Congress is setting up.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to take the Senator's time, but I derived the impression early in his remarks that his main objection was that the payment of the pension, the distribution of the fund, is so tied in with the collection of the fund as to make them one and the same transaction, and that, therefore, the bill would be subject to grave constitutional question, whereas either transaction standing, on its own bottom, would not be subject to that fear.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield first to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. As I understand the decision in the Child Labor case, it was to the effect that, although the act purported to raise revenue, as a matter of fact, it did not raise any revenue.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Supreme Court held that it was never intended to raise revenue.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly; and that is what I am trying to say here. In that respect the principle is in point that this proposed act does not raise any revenue for the General Treasury, because all the money that it does raise is taken out and devoted to this specific purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to ask the Senator, if this proposed act does, in fact, raise any revenue?

Mr. GEORGE. It is not intended to raise revenue, but it is intended to furnish support to the old-age-annuity and unemployment-insurance sections of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then the Supreme Court held that the Child Labor Act was an encroachment upon the police powers of the States, and that was really its purpose, in effect, if it was good for anything; that it deprived the States of the exercise of their police powers. Does this bill interfere with the establishment of old-age pensions and legislation on the subject by the States?

Mr. GEORGE. No, it does not, I may say to the Senator; I do not understand it so interferes at all.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GEORGE. My time is limited on the amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. I will give the Senator some of my time, although, if it annoys him, I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I desire to have a clear understanding of the Senator's point. The two features of the bill, paying the pension and raising the taxes, are separated. As I understand the proposed legislation, when the tax is collected it is to be paid into the General Treasury?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; that is true.

Mr. WAGNER. And out of the General Treasury there will be made an appropriation for the payment of the pension?

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. WAGNER. In answer to my inquiry a short time ago, I understood the Senator to say that he did not doubt the power of Congress to make an appropriation for the purpose of paying old-age pensions to a class not arbitrarily selected. Thus, even if the court should hold that the classification of those taxed was an arbitrary classification and therefore unconstitutional, nevertheless the remainder of the bill, the portions providing for the payment of old-age pensions, could survive such a decision, could it not?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I was not considering that phase of it; I was considering the taxing power as being in fact, under this bill, tied in with the particular provision of title II, and a portion of title III of the bill.

Mr. WAGNER. But the Senator understands that the tax, as collected, is paid into the General Treasury?

Mr. GEORGE. I do, under the bill, and I so stated.

Mr. WAGNER. Exactly. There is an appropriation for paying old-age pensions?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. So it could very well be held by the Court to be constitutional.

Mr. GEORGE. If the tax was stricken down, it could very well be that the other portions of the bill might be held to be valid; I am not controverting that; but I do say it is not within the granted power of Congress to set up directly this kind of a pension system in the United States. It might be done, but I am trying to show that, despite the conscious and undoubted effort to separate the tax from the scheme set up in title II of the bill, nevertheless, the Court will look beyond the mere words or mere form and to the substance of the thing, and they will say that they are tied together, or, as I said in the beginning, they are likely to say they are tied together, or at least a serious question is raised as to whether they are tied together here.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one further question. Assuming that they are tied together, and the Court finds that the tax is levied upon a class that really gains a benefit through the payment of old-age pensions, might not the Court very well find that the Congress did make a proper classification for the purpose of imposing the tax?

Mr. GEORGE. It might find it, but let me ask the Senator from New York, if the taxing provision of the bill should be stricken down, would he undertake to justify the provision for old-age annuities running, as it does, to special classes if we are forced to go to the General Treasury for the money?

Mr. WAGNER. No!

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator very frankly says "no."

Mr. WAGNER. I say "no" because I am for the insurance system.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand, and I am asking the Senator the question if the taxing provision of the bill should be stricken down, would the Senator undertake to restrict title II to those employees who now come within it?

Mr. WAGNER. No. I should say we would have to revise the classifications altogether, of course.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand the Senator's viewpoint.

Mr. WAGNER. I think the Senator and I do not disagree on that point.

Mr. GEORGE. I know we do not.

Mr. WAGNER. I am very confident that it is a proper exercise of the taxing power and that the incidental purpose is valid for that reason.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not confident of it, and if time sufficed I should be glad to go into the constitutional question at length.

The Senator from New York now admits—and it does his conscience and humane purpose very great credit—that if the taxing provision of the bill should be stricken down he would limit the benefits under title II to those who now would receive them under title II. He is quite right about it. Therefore, I have said that title VIII is tied in inescapably with title II, and its sole purpose is to impose a tax for setting up a system of insurance and old-age annuities.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator please let me finish my statement? I think I have been quite liberal in yielding.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator made an assertion, but whatever I say cannot bind my colleagues as to what should be done in the event the tax provision is stricken down.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand that, but I understand the real proponents of the legislation——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Georgia on the amendment has expired. Does the Senator desire to be recognized on the bill?

Mr. GEORGE. I shall take my time on the bill.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BONE. Is it the view of the Senator that any effort on the part of the Congress to set up a general old-age pension system would involve a vested property right, the right to advance a claim for monthly pension from Federal sources, and that a system of that kind would infringe upon the Constitution in a way to make it unconstitutional?

Mr. GEORGE. I am not discussing that question.

Mr. BONE. I understand that.

Mr. GEORGE. The bill grants benefits to a special and limited class and it imposes a burden upon a special and limited class.

Mr. BONE. My question was quite outside of that point.

Mr. GEORGE. I would rather not go into that wider field. I am going to undertake to say further as to the constitutionality of the tax that even the tax, to be constitutional, must be immune against the provisions of the fifth amendment. In other words, it is permissible under the fifth amendment to question the validity of the tax. Here is a tax upon certain employers. The beneficiaries of the tax are those who come within title II, let us say, of the bill, and they are a limited class. The tax on employers to support the system is levied at a uniform rate without regard to the hazards of industry. The mining company which sends its men down to the bowels of the earth, where fatalities often occur, has to bear the same burden of tax as the industry in which retirement, accidents, and death rarely and seldom occur. That is another feature involving the constitutionality of the measure, but I do not intend to do more than say that no responsible lawyer who has been in a courthouse three times would dare say that the provisions of this bill which have been discussed are not subject to serious question.

I do not have to go further than that, and on that predicate I say why strike down the private systems which have been built up through the years and which have granted benefits to employees? Why not preserve them?

The answer is, "We do not strike them down. They will still go on", when we know that will not be the case. Our mail is full of assurances by responsible men that they will be compelled to abandon their own systems if this tax shall be imposed upon them and if they shall have to pay it.

Also it was answered us in committee that none of the private systems grant equal benefits to those provided in title II and title III of the bill. If none of them grant equal benefit, pray answer me why would private industry maintain a system which did not grant equal benefits, but at the same time pay taxes to set up another system which increases the benefits over those of the private system then in existence? In other words, it is said in one breath that the private system can do more and will do more, that the private companies will maintain their private plans, and in the next breath we are answered and told that not one of the private systems maintained by private companies in this country bestows benefits equal to those provided by the bill.

Now let me answer those who stand firmly against the amendment, and they ought to be answered for the benefit of the American people. There is but one solid ground of objection to the amendment and that is the basic ground upon which it stands. Those who oppose the amendment want to put in the Federal Government the business of pensioning the people of the country. They want to centralize power here. They want to socialize and federalize the Nation in all its affairs. Otherwise they would accept the amendment and say, "We will not take the risk of striking down the private insurance systems in this country which have been built up through the years. We will not take the risk of destroying them, but of the private companies and individuals setting up their own insurance plans we will require—we will absolutely demand of them—that they set up a plan equal to that set up in the law of Congress. If they do that we will let them operate.

It may be said—it can be said, I concede, that the exemption from the tax of those who set up an acceptable and approved plan of insurance or of benefits, may emphasize the character of the bill, may further open it to attack upon constitutional grounds; but it is already open to attack. It is inescapable that the Court will be called upon to pass upon this bill. I do not wish to assert dogmatically that the Court will strike it down, but I do wish to say that no well-grounded lawyer can say certainly and dogmatically that the bill will ultimately prevail. Surely there is serious question of its validity when we look beyond the form and words of the bill to its substance.

The real objection to the amendment, the basic objection to the amendment, is not that it takes out the strong and leaves the weak to pay the tax, is not, in my humble judgment, the ground which has been advanced, but the real objection is the overweening desire of those who seek to concentrate in Washington all power and reduce the States to a system of vassalage, and to convert a free people, able and willing to manage and conduct their own affairs, into humble supplicants for the crumbs and for the benefits which may fall from the national table. I do not think it is healthy or wholesome. The least that can be done is to take this amendment and let the private systems continue to function if they grant equal or superior benefits, and let industry carry on as it has been carrying on through a period of years in building up these private systems.

It is said that only 1 percent or a fraction of 1 percent of all employees are now able to receive benefits through these private systems. Grant it; but up to this time the Federal Government has done nothing to induce, to aid, or to assist, and remarkable progress has been made in setting up some 450 private systems now operating in the United States, and making at least some provision for a large number of employees working for the individuals and companies which have established these private systems.

I wish it to be definitely understood that the purpose and objective of old-age annuities and of unemployment insurance have my heartiest approval; but in my judgment there is no necessity for the impatience with which we seek to do things which we cannot do, and then the courts strike them down and destroy all that industry has done.

The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] has gone from the floor; but I recall that he was equally certain that the railway pension retirement act was constitutional, and yet the Supreme Court—by a divided Court, it is true—said that it was not.

From this bill are already excepted State employees and Federal employees, as the Senator from Missouri said, perhaps the largest class of employees working for one concern or one corporation or one political subdivision or one sovereignty in all of the United States. Already they are excepted from the bill. They do not pay any tax. Of course, the Government does not, as a tax, nor do the employees who work for the Government or for the States or for the municipalities, nor does agricultural labor or domestic labor. I am not saying that those exceptions are not properly granted; that if it were a mere matter of classification they would not constitute a proper basis for classification. I am not asserting that at all; but I am saying that the bill is already open to the constitutional objection which I candidly concede may be emphasized by further exceptions of classes on whom it does not operate. At the same time the question is there, and the act may go down before the decision of the Court; and if it does, then we shall have lost, after some 1 or 2 years of trial, all that has been gained by the efforts of private employers to set up their own systems.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. In the event the Senator should be satisfied that this measure is constitutional, would he favor the Clark amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. I think I should still favor the Clark amendment.

Mr. WALSH. In other words, it is not merely the irreparable loss that may result to employees who are now receiving benefits under private arrangements with their employers about which the Senator is concerned. Of course, there would be almost irreparable harm to them if this measure should be found to be unconstitutional.

Mr. GEORGE. That is quite true.

Mr. WALSH. But the Senator goes further than that, and regardless of the constitutionality of the measure, he is inclined to favor lifting out of it those private companies which make beneficial arrangements with their employees?

Mr. GEORGE. I do, but I was stressing the other point upon this particular amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in that connection, of course, if the courts should declare the act unconstitutional, it would then have no effect upon these private annuity arrangements. They would go on just as they are now.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly; but in the meantime they would have been destroyed. The employers would have abandoned any effort to maintain their organizations. They would not wait for a year or two until the Supreme Court passed upon this measure and abide by the decision, or go into the courts at the expense of heavy litigation to test the constitutionality of the measure.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. I received this suggestion from the head of one of the largest banks in the State of Missouri, who told me that they have had a pension system for more than 20 years, and that they now have a large number of employees who will be eligible to retirement in the next year or two. If the bill should be passed without the amendment I have offered, and should strike down that pension system, and then the act should be declared unconstitutional, those men would simply be deprived of their rights.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Missouri will recall that the bill especially exempts Government agencies and Government employees, also such persons as are employed by a national bank.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator that this is not a national bank.

Mr. HARRISON. If it is a part of the Federal Reserve System, it is exempt.

Mr. CLARK. This was simply an illustration; not that that particular bank was important. I used the illustration to show what might happen in any industry where there is now established such a pension plan. It does not make any particular difference about whether or not that particular bank would be exempt, if the same thing ran through industry wherever private pension plans are now existing.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GEORGE. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Would the Senator from Missouri accept an amendment that would permit the status quo to continue between employees and employers who now have insurance benefits until such time as the Supreme Court might pass upon the constitutionality of this measure?

Mr. CLARK. I should be perfectly willing to accept such an amendment as that, but I do not think such an amendment would reach the whole question.

Mr. WALSH. It would not completely take care of the Senator's objection.

Mr. CLARK. That is perfectly true.

Mr. WALSH. It would in part, but it would not completely do so. The Senator still thinks, notwithstanding the passage of this bill, that private employers who desire to make special arrangements with their employees should be permitted to do so?

Mr. CLARK. I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I had not intended to occupy the time I have taken, and I had not intended to discuss the general bill under consideration. I had intended to confine myself strictly to the Clark amendment. My purpose was to point out at least the possibility of serious constitutional objection to titles II and VIII of the bill as it now stands; admitting that further exceptions from those who are made liable to the tax may still open the bill somewhat to more direct attack, nevertheless, that question is there, and the Supreme Court will be compelled to meet it whenever a proper case reaches that tribunal; and that if the Court should hold the act unconstitutional, all that has been gained by individuals and companies that have operated their own systems probably would be lost; at least, the larger part of it would be lost. While many of the systems operated by individuals and corporations and associations may be open to question, while many of their practices may be subjected to certain sharp criticisms, nevertheless on the whole they have accomplished great social good for their employees; and therefore this simple amendment, which gives the election to the employee to go under the Federal system or to remain in his private system, ought to be adopted as a part of this proposed legislation.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have been much impressed by what the author of the amendment has said, as well as by what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has stated.

I desire to use a part of my time in asking questions of the Senator from Missouri regarding the effects of this plan.

I am disturbed because in my State many industrial concerns have arrangements for insurance and of course prefer not to be disturbed. At the same time there are many citizens of New York who feel that to permit the continuance of the private insurance arrangements would result materially to reduce the level of age of the employees in such industrial establishments. For these reasons I wish to ask a question or two of the Senator from Missouri, questions founded on an analysis of his amendment which has been given to me.

We will assume that a basic condition to permitting an employer to maintain a private pension plan would be the establishment of benefits at least equal to those under the Security Act. The two main factors in cost would be the general level of wages and salaries paid by the employer, and the ages of his employees. The younger the employees, and the higher the level of pay, the greater the advantage to the employer in buying annuities from a private insurance company.

Of course, these two basic factors are in part opposed to each other, since high age distribution is usually associated with higher than average wages.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Under the amendment as it is now before the Senate the objection the Senator has just raised is taken care of by the provision that the employer must pay into his private pension system or into any other system not less than the amount of the tax he would pay in under the Government plan; so that if there be any advantage to an employer who employs younger men, that advantage must go to the employees, because the employer will be able to buy more annuity with the amount of tax he is required to pay in.

Mr. COPELAND. That is a very satisfactory answer; but I desire to press the matter for the moment, in order that my conscience may be clear.

Does the Senator from Missouri believe that this private plan would tend to the employment of fewer persons over middle age? The problem of employment for a person past middle age, of course, is rapidly becoming one of the most serious social problems with which we have to deal. Would the effect of the amendment which the Senator has offered be to intensify that problem?

Mr. CLARK. I do not see how that could possibly be true, in view of the fact that the employer at every stage of the game, at every period of paying the tax, must pay into the private pension fund not less than the amount of tax; and then, when the employment of the employee is terminated, there must be paid into the Government fund as much as the tax would have been compounded at 3 percent annually.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. I take it to be his view that the amendment would not aggravate unemployment among the middle aged.

Mr. CLARK. I do not see how it possibly could.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume the Senator has seen the same analysis to which I am referring.

Mr. CLARK. I have never seen that particular analysis, but I may say to the Senator that the same question was raised in the committee, and that the amendment was drawn to meet that specific objection.

Mr. COPELAND. So the Senator is quite satisfied that the retention of these successful private systems would in no sense endanger the employment of persons of advanced age, and could not be used by the industries which have such systems to coerce employees in any sense?

Mr. CLARK. I do not see how it possibly could. I may say to the Senator from New York that I have agreed with the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] to accept an amendment to my amendment which will provide specifically that the election to go under a private system shall not in any sense be made a condition of employment or of retention of employment, which I think would be an improvement on the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator from Washington what his amendment is? It perhaps covers the very point I have in mind.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, on page 2, line 16 of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, after the word "plan", I propose to insert a colon instead of the period and the words "Provided, That no employer shall make election to come or remain under the plan a condition precedent to the securing or retention of employment."

Mr. CLARK. I am glad to accept that amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. I think that is a very valuable amendment.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. If the Senator has no objection, I might offer it at this time.

Mr. COPELAND. I wish the Senator would do so, because it would help to answer the criticism I have in mind.

Mr. CLARK. I accept the amendment, and modify my own amendment in accordance therewith.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, which the clerk will report.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 16, after the word "plan", it is proposed to insert a colon instead of the period and the following words:

Provided, That no employer shall make election to come or remain under the plan a condition precedent for the securing or retention of employment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I inquire whether this is a perfecting amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a perfecting amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH].

Mr. CLARK. I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, and modify my own amendment in accordance therewith.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I take it that answers the criticism I had in mind, namely, that the encouragement of private pension plans would place powerful coercive weapons in the hands of employers.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I may say to the Senator that that was my purpose in preparing the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. I think it is a very valuable addition to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

As I review the amendment, as it now stands, as compared with the amendment as it was originally offered, I think it has been very greatly improved. To a great degree it answers the criticisms which have been passed upon it. I am glad, because, as I have already said, there are many private plans in force in my own State, and they have been very successful in most instances. Yet I would not want anything to interfere with the proposed legislation, which to my mind is very important.

The greatest tragedy in the world is the tragedy of old age in poverty, and whatever we can do to relieve the distress of mind of those of our people who have not been fortunate enough to accumulate the wherewithal to be maintained in old age is a very desirable and necessary thing to do. At this time, too, there are thousands of families, I suppose millions, who thought they had prepared for the rainy day, but by reason of the depression, and the circumstances involved in it, they have come to be almost as bad off as many who were born and have lived all their lives in poverty.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to a plan in force in a company in his own State as an example of private pension plans. I refer to the Socony Vacuum Oil Co. I have in my hand a letter from the chairman of the annuity insurance committee of that company in which he states:

The employee pays 3 percent of his wages into the fund; the company pays approximately 4 or 4½ percent into the fund.

Over 99 percent of our employees are under the plan, which is insured with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. The average pension payable exceeds the maximum $85 payable under the Government plan.

I should like to read that again:

The average pension payable exceeds the maximum $85 payable under the Government plan.

In other words, under this plan the average annuity is greater than is possible under the Government plan.

As part of this plan, each employee is carried for life insurance to the extent of 1 year's salary, for which he pays six-tenths of 1 percent and the company pays the balance.

Our company desires to continue with its private plan.

I ask the Senator this question: When a company has been willing voluntarily, without any compulsion of law, to do more for its employees than is likely or than would be permitted under the proposed act, why should not those employees have the benefit of that additional plan?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I merely desire to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that under most of the private pension plans an ex-employee does not have to prove himself to be needy in order to get his pension.

Mr. CLARK. That is perfectly true; the pension accrues as a matter of right.

Mr. LONG. It accrues as a matter of right, but under the particular bill before us that would be wiped out, and unless a man proved himself to be a pauper he could not qualify for the pension roll.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the great trouble in the United States, and I suppose all over the world, is that when a man or woman approaches middle life, or passes middle age, and is out of employment, it is almost impossible to find new employment. There is almost unanimity of opinion among employers that such persons are not desirable employees; the situation is pathetic.

My only regret about the bill is that we have not been a little bit more generous in it. I assume we will go just as far as we can, and we ought to, but certainly if there is one thing which stirs the emotions and should excite us to do the right thing it is the urge to take care of aged persons.

We can find means to aid the babies, we establish institutions to prevent disease, but the most amazing thing is that the homes for the care of old people are almost bankrupt. If we cannot through voluntary contributions maintain in decency persons in old age, then certainly it is time for the Government to step in and undertake what is intended to be done by this measure. As I have said, my only regret is that we cannot deal more generously with our aged citizens.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before a vote is taken on the amendment I desire to say to the Membership of the Senate that there was no question presented to the committee related to the pending legislation to which we gave more consideration than to the question before us. It was presented by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield. I mean the idea was presented by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will permit, I merely desire to recall to the Senator's mind the fact that the amendment was lost in the committee on a tie vote only.

Mr. HARRISON. That corroborates my statement that the committee gave the matter every consideration.

When the question was first presented to the committee, the amendment appealed to me, as one member of the committee, and I am sure it appealed to others. I thought that those institutions which had built up private pension systems of their own should be commended; that they had taken a great forward and progressive step and that they should be encouraged because they were forward looking; and personally I did not want to see anything done by legislation which might hamper their progressive march.

When we begin to analyze the proposition, however, from every angle and to stop, look, and listen, we find there is more to it than might appear at first glance, and I changed from the first opinion that I held about the matter.

We had before us some experts; one gentleman from Rochester, N. Y., Mr. Folsom, who made a splendid presentation and was thoroughly informed on the matter. He is a man of extraordinary ability and has charge of the pension system for the Eastman Kodak Co. It is my impression that he is thoroughly satisfied with this provision as written now. He appeared before us when the bill was being considered in executive session by the Finance Committee.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. So far as Mr. Folsom is concerned, the Senator will recall that in the executive session of the Finance Committee, when this proposition was under discussion, the statement was made by Mr. Murray W. Latimer that Mr. Folsom did not approve this amendment, and I have here a communication from Mr. Folsom in which he says that Mr. Latimer was not authorized in any way to say that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am not in a combative mood or of such disposition at all. I am in the most amiable spirit in the world. My greatest desire is to try to finish the debate on the bill this afternoon and send the bill to conference; so I admit, if the Senator makes the statement, that it is so. I have been led to believe that he is satisfied with it. Mr. Latimer, who is one of the great experts on this legislation, appeared before the committee and, if I correctly recall his testimony, he said he met with the representatives of nine of the biggest industrial institutions of the country, which had inaugurated and carried on for many years these private pension plans, and he said that of the 9 representatives present 5 of them thought it was better for these corporations to come under the Government's pension plan.

Let us see now why some believe that it is better to have one system than for business institutions to continue their individual pension systems and not participate in the proposed plan. It was pointed out by the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] the other day that there is favored treatment accorded to those in the old, ripe years over those of younger years. We admit that. It is just so. It cannot be otherwise. They have worked many years in comparison with the short period they will be under the proposed annuity system, and consequently we give them proportionately more for the time they are in the system than we do younger men.

Then some of us believe that in a great crisis such as the present, with problems such as now face us, that favored treatment should be given to help to bear the burdens of the older worker. However, that was the Senator's criticism of the bill. When he compared the benefits and burdens imposed by this measure, he found that the old received larger benefits compared to burdens. If these private institutions are permitted to carry on their private pension plan, there is nothing in the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] which prevents them from doing what they please in the matter of discharging men when they reach a certain age, because of the heavy obligations which are imposed upon the private industrial institutions, and take on in their places younger men, because the younger the men are the less heavy are the obligations.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is there anything in the bill as it now stands which prevents an industrial company from laying off men when they reach a certain age?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. What is in the bill that prevents that, which is not in the amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, they can fire them if they want to, so far as direct provisions of either bill or amendment is concerned.

Mr. CLARK. In other words the same situation exactly exists under the bill as it is proposed which will exist under the bill with the amendment in it, is that not correct? Is that not precisely the situation?

Mr. HARRISON. There is nothing in the bill which compels an institution to keep somebody on, but there is a provision that if a man has worked a number of years, or has reached a certain age, or he dies, that he or his heirs shall get a certain fixed payment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. It does not have to be in the law, it seems to me, for the reason that if the company buys a private annuity for all of its men it would certainly be able to buy it much cheaper if it were to employ men from 21 to 25 than it could if it kept men from 50 to 65 years of age.

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely.

Mr. BLACK. So there is the strongest inducement in the world for them to endeavor to get the insurance the cheapest way possible, and you would find them competing to get cheaper rates of private insurance by employing younger men, if they were permitted to discharge their older employees.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator from Alabama will take the trouble to read the amendment he will find a specific provision in the amendment that the employer under private practice shall pay into the private-pension plan not less than the amount of the tax. So that his argument of there being an incentive to employ younger men absolutely falls down. If it be true that by employing younger men he is able to get his insurance cheaper, then by reason of the fact that he must pay in at least the amount of the tax he can simply get more annuity for the employees.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator at one place in his amendment provides:

> Except that if any such employee withdraws from the plan before he attains the age of 65, or if the Board withdraws its approval of the plan, the service performed while the employee was under such plan as approved shall be construed to be employment as defined in this subsection.

In other words, if there is a private industrial institution with a private pension system, and it should go bankrupt just before an employee became 65 years of age, or entitled to the pension, the responsibility would be placed on the Government, and it would have to pay the pension and not the private institution, because there would be nothing left of that institution. There is another provision in the amendment which says that he can receive back the amount he paid in——

Mr. CLARK. Plus 3 percent interest; exactly what he would get under the Government system.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. There is this about that. The amount he pays in amounts to 3½ percent of his wages, payable in the case of death to the estate. What the employer paid in thus goes into the Federal Treasury of the United States, if the employee is in the Federal system, and is lost to the Treasury if the employer has a private system. The older man would naturally be left in the Federal system, and funds from general taxation paying benefits under the Senator's amendment.

However, aside from all the analysis which we might go on with here, which I was hopeful we might avoid, the simple question, Members of the Senate, is this: We did not adopt this amendment which was offered in the committee because, first, we thought it might be an encouragement to private institutions to stay out of the system, weakening the Federal plan and giving a leverage to private institutions to discharge their employees when they had reached a certain age, and to take on younger men, or that same institution would go out and take Federal insurance under this plan to the number of its older men, but as to the younger men they would carry private insurance, because the burden would not be so great in one case as in the other case; and, secondly, some of us believed that it would add to the doubtfulness of the constitutionality of this bill. Of course, I do not know, and no one else can know what the Supreme Court will hold.

Mr. CLARK rose.

Mr. HARRISON. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. I had not completed my sentence. I can talk so much better when the Senator is sitting down. No one in the world can tell what law is going to be held unconstitutional until it is passed on by the Supreme Court. I am not criticizing the Supreme Court. They have their functions to perform and we have our functions to perform; but I might say incidentally that when the question comes up before the Senate of two-thirds of the Justices passing on the unconstitutionality of congressional legislation I am going to support that proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, what is that? What did the Senator say?

Mr. HARRISON. It is not worth repeating to the Senator. [Laughter in the galleries.] I do not suppose that the Senator agrees with me.

In the Child Labor case the Supreme Court did declare that act unconstitutional. They declared it unconstitutional when Congress levied a tax upon products made by child labor, or by those under a certain age, which entered into interstate commerce.

Here the measure presents a uniform system of old-age benefits. The taxing features of the bill are entirely separate from other provisions. These taxing provisions are to raise revenue which, it is believed, will roughly equal anticipated appropriations for unemployment insurance and a system of annuities. Whether that will have any influence on the Supreme Court I do not know, but it was drafted by some very fine experts, and the tax features are over here in a part by themselves, so far as the constructive features of this legislation are concerned.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. It will not have any effect on the court unless the Senator talks about it.

Mr. HARRISON. The experts drafted it, and it is there, and we hope that it will have its influence and its bearing. However, if this amendment were adopted, it would seem to me that it would make the measure more doubtful than otherwise, because with this you are imposing a tax and trying to compel people to set up unemployment plans, because you say to them, "If you do not go into a private insurance plan, we are going to tax you." That might be held analogous to the Child Labor case.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HARRISON. I promised to yield to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] first.

Mr. CLARK. I do not desire to disturb the Senator's train of thought, because he has left the subject upon which he was talking at the time I tried to get him to yield.

I should like to get the Senator to explain merely wherein his statement is correct that under this amendment as it now stands there could possibly be any advantage to an employer financially in staying under a private plan and being under the Government plan, assuming that he employed younger men, if he has to pay the amount of tax, anyway, plus a further amount?

Mr. HARRISON. Let us take the provisions with reference to the proposal in the bill as recommended by the committee:

All industrial employers pay the tax imposed, and annually appropriations are made to the reserve fund to be invested; a large reserve is to be built up through their investment, by the purchase of Government bonds, and so on. The purpose is to give strength to the fund and assurance that when employees shall reach 65 they will get the payments due them, and when they shall pass off the stage of life their estates will receive the money to which the worker was entitled. But if an industry sets up a private plan under the amendment it is separate and apart; the board to be created will not be authorized to investigate, for instance, what reserve the private institution may have.

Mr. CLARK. The board has to approve the plan.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; the board has to approve the plan when the application is first made, but there is nothing in the amendment with reference to the board following through to determine whether or not the reserves may be dissipated, or what may become of them, of what the financial status of the industrial corporation is; and, consequently, after men have paid into this private fund for years and years, if the institution becomes bankrupt, they may lose their all.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. It is perfectly apparent the Senator has not read the amendment, because in paragraphs (c) and (d), page 3, it is specifically provided:

(c) The Board shall have the right to call for such reports from the employer and to make such inspections of his records as will satisfy it that the requirements of subsection (b) are being met, and to make such regulations as will facilitate the operation of such private annuity plans in conformity with such requirements.

(d) The Board shall withdraw its approval of any such plan upon the request of the employer, or if it finds that the plan or any action taken thereunder fails to meet the requirements of subsection (b).

So the board has the authority to follow up the operation of the private plan, and it is the duty of the board to do so, though I do not concur in your conclusion, but conceding it for the moment.

Mr. HARRISON. If the board should withdraw its approval of the plan, and the fund has been dissipated, or there is not sufficient reserve to meet the demands upon the fund, or the plan is discarded, then what is going to happen to the poor individual who has been paying into the fund for many years and who is shortly about to reach the age limit?

Mr. CLARK. The reserves will largely be invested under supervision of the board and under such regulations as the board may make.

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment does not say "under the supervision of the board."

Mr. CLARK. Let me read the Senator the provision:

The contributions of the employee and the employer shall be deposited with a life-insurance company, an annuity organization, or a trustee, approved by the Board.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but it does not say anything about continuing supervision, as I understand. When a concern makes application for the approval of a particular plan the board has authority to approve it, but it has no jurisdiction, as I understand, to follow through with subsequent investigation and with general supervision and control of the funds of the private institution.

Mr. CLARK. Subsection 3 clearly gives the board that authority.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, with his usual force and ability, the Senator from Mississippi has stated the reasons for rejecting this amendment. May I ask the Senator whether it is not true that the experts who have continuously counseled the committee with respect to this proposed legislation believe that this amendment threatens the welfare of the older workers and is calculated to impair the integrity and efficiency of the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. As I have suggested, I was led to believe in this proposal when it was first advanced, but later I became thoroughly convinced that it might be used to the disadvantage of the older men in favor of the younger men; that it might affect greatly the system we are trying to put into operation; that it also might affect the constitutionality of the measure; and that is why, as one member of the committee, I did not support it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The point has not been raised, as I recall, but it seems to me that this amendment may endanger the constitutionality of the proposed act on another ground. The Constitution provides that:

> All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Of course, that does not mean that Congress has to levy the same kind of tax on everybody in the United States; Congress has the power to classify the people for the purpose of taxation; but within that class the tax must be uniform. How can the Congress establish a class in order to bring about uniformity of taxation and then lift individuals or groups out of that class and say, "You shall not be subject to the tax provided you have a private institution of your own", without endangering the constitutionality of the tax on the ground of the lack of uniformity?

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator. I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment and that it will be rejected.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It seems to me there is a question of policy involved here. I have had, in recent years, complaints from people who supposed they were the beneficiaries of private retirement systems but who found that the reserve funds invested to carry on the retirement plan had been so badly invested that when the time came for them to receive the benefits which were anticipated, and which they expected to receive annually, the condition of the fund was such that the amount received by them, in many cases, was very little. Others have complained that they have been discharged from the service a year before the date for their retirement without, at least so they claim, any just cause. I wonder if the committee has considered the injustices and the disappointments which in many cases have come to those who are supposed to be beneficiaries of private pension systems.

Mr. HARRISON. That, as I have stated, was among the reasons that caused some of us to oppose the adoption of such an amendment as is now pending. There is nothing in this proposed legislation that will prevent private institutions from carrying on their pension systems just as they have carried them on in the past. They can do that if they so desire. There is no reason in the world because of the adoption of this measure for any person who has an interest in such a private fund and who has been a participant in a private pension system losing it. He will have all his equities and all his rights just the same. If a private pension system is, as some have pointed out, better than the Government's plan, those supporting it will have a perfect right, so far as this legislation is concerned, to carry it on as they have done in the past. If some big-hearted industry has been doing that, it can continue to do it just the same. Of course, it will have to pay the tax that is required under the proposed law, but it may add that to the benefits of its employees.

Mr. President, it was stated by the Senator from Georgia that we are trying to centralize administration of the system here in Washington. I do not think he was talking about me, but he was talking about some who have had something to do with the framing of this proposed legislation. It must be recalled that when this proposal was first made to the Senate Finance Committee it gave much more power to officials in Washington, so far as pensions were concerned. The authorities here were to pass on State plans with respect to amount of pensions, who should get pensions, and so forth. They were, in many respects, to pass on standards of my State, such as those specifying who is a needy individual and how much he is to obtain; but we subsequently effected a complete change.

I know it was the opinion of the Committee on Finance that the whole order should be changed and that the authority should be vested in the States. The House acted first; they completely rewrote the bill, and they left it to the States to say who should get a pension. The Finance Committee put in only the limitations that the Federal Government would contribute pensions to needy aged individuals. The $15 per month Federal contribution does not limit the pension to $30. The State may go up higher than that if it so desires. The measure also provides that the age should be 65 years, with the exception that up to 1940 the State, if it chooses, may fix the age at 70. So the measure is not one which centralizes everything in Washington, but it is to be left largely to the States to determine how to expend this money.

Of course, the Federal annuity the proposed amendment affects is wholly a Federal matter and naturally is administered in Washington, but this is only one of the many phases of the bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I notice the Senator is of the opinion that the administration is to be left to the States. I call his attention to the fact, however, that the board in Washington can judge that the State has failed to comply with the general outline or the specific plan and can thereby eliminate the State from receiving a contribution. In other words, whenever the board takes a notion it can cut off the State.

Mr. HARRISON. No; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. LONG. Let the Senator look on page 6.

Mr. HARRISON. We lay down the conditions——

Mr. LONG. But the bill lets the board be the judge.

Mr. HARRISON. And we leave to the States to say who shall be the persons selected to receive the Federal assistance.

Mr. LONG. But the Senator does not catch my point.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, reports must be made to Washington.

Mr. LONG. Not only that, but the board is the sole judge as to whether or not the act is being properly carried out by the States. The board is the sole judge of the facts and of the law, and it can say, "Under the law and the facts we have decided that the State of Mississippi is not complying with this law, and therefore it will receive no more help from the Federal Government for pensions." Furthermore, not even an appeal to the courts has been provided. The board can cut the States off if it wants to, and my experience has always been that when boards are made judges of the facts and the law they fit the law and the facts to whatever they want to do.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, the States have to make reports to Washington, and they should make reports to Washington. The Federal Government will be expending millions of dollars, and some agency of the Federal Government should know about the expenditure and should have reports. We do that with reference to the Federal aid for roads, for which purpose we appropriate millions of dollars; naturally, reports have to be made and some supervision provided. But the bill gives the maximum amount of jurisdiction and authority and power and discretion to the States with reference to the aid granted for old-age pensions, and with reference also, I may say, to unemployment insurance and provision for child welfare, and so forth. When this bill was first proposed to our committee it provided what kind of plan of unemployment insurance there should be. We broadened it so that the State itself may adopt unemployment insurance providing for pooled funds, separate accounts, or a combination of these plans.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that if the board should decide that the States are discriminating among the people to whom they are giving pensions, if the board should decide the States are giving to the nonneedy and leaving out the needy, if the board should decide that any of the sections of the bill are not being carried out in spirit or in letter, the board could cut off any State if it should want to cut it off. A blind man can see that if he knows what has happened in similar cases. He would know they could cut off whom they wanted to. The facts are always there, as Frederick the Great had them, as I was telling, and there are always professors in universities to explain the reason they have for cutting them off.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think I have said all I desire to say.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I do not desire to extend this discussion unduly. I only wish to call the attention of the Senate to a few considerations that make me very apprehensive about the pending amendment. One of our great industrial problems—and I think most Senators who have given any thought to the subject realize it—has been the preservation of employment opportunities for older men, men above 40 years of age. We have heard time and time again that industry refuses to employ these men. In spite of what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] said, surveys which have been made time after time show that private pension plans tend to discourage the employment of older men.

The bill now pending would do away with the incentive to get rid of the older workers, because the contributions of the employer and the employee will be the same whether the man employed is 55 years of age or 30. There will be no financial advantage to be derived merely by the employment of younger men.

To show that there has been discrimination in the past I cite the fact, that of all the employees who have been entitled to draw pensions from industry under voluntary pension systems, only 4 percent of them are actually drawing any benefits. Men are rarely employed until they reach the age where they would be entitled to a pension. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri would tend to perpetuate this evil. It would create an incentive to the discharge of older workers that many employers could not resist.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator be kind enough to explain wherein that danger lies?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; I shall try to do so. Under the bill as now drawn the older men of today will receive an annuity which is greater than they will have actually earned. The theory is that the younger men and the employees who are contributing to the fund will make up that difference by contributing over a longer period of time; otherwise the system would, of course, become bankrupt.

Industries are going to try to make this plan as inexpensive to themselves as possible. If they employ older men, they will have to use part of the funds contributed by the younger men to pay the annuities to the older men. The chances are that the employer himself will have to make up a substantial part of the difference.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. If under the amendment the employer is required to pay into the private fund not less than the amount of the taxes he would have to pay if he were paying into the Government fund, where can there be any advantage in the way the Senator has indicated?

Mr. WAGNER. If he has a greater number of older men than of younger men, his fund is bound to become bankrupt; because, as I said, when the older man of today retires he will get an annuity far larger than he has actually earned. Somebody has to make up that difference. If there is a large pooling system, however, to which the younger men and the employers throughout the country contribute, there will be ample funds to make up the difference.

Mr. CLARK. Under the amendment the employee cannot possibly get less than he would get under the Government system. The employer cannot contribute less than he would contribute if he were under the Government system.

Mr. WAGNER. But the employer will say that he will not employ older men. He does not want the problem of having to pay his employees more than they have actually earned. It is very clear to me, although I may not have made it very clear to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator certainly has not.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I suppose it has already been pointed out, but the chief objection to the amendment is that it will interfere with any wide-spread general plan. All the prosperous businesses will build up their own little plan, thinking they can save money by it, and there will be left only the little wabbling, crippled corporations to participate in the Government plan. It seems to me the plan ought to be universal in its application.

Mr. WAGNER. That is the only way to make it work successfully.

Mr. CONNALLY. If we have the same standard throughout all industry, then no one will have any advantage over anybody else in industry.

Mr. WAGNER. That is the idea of any pooling system.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The same rule would apply under section 909, where provision is made for a lesser tax based on experience.

Mr. WAGNER. That may be, but there is no question of a national pooling system there. Each State has its own system. Under the bill it may be a pooling system, or it may not be. A State may enact a law permitting private industries to carry their own unemployment insurance funds. That has no bearing here.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. If it is absolutely necessary to have a uniform and universal system, why is it the Senator has excepted some existing systems?

Mr. WAGNER. I meant universal within a class.

Mr. GEORGE. Why so? Why say "class"?

Mr. WAGNER. We must have a pooling system, insofar as those with whom we deal are concerned. We need not include in the pool classes excluded from the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. The chairman of the committee stated a little while ago that the national banking system, which had its own pension plan, would be under the Government system, while the State banking system, which is not under control of the Federal Government, would be outside the Government plan.

Mr. WAGNER. A number of States have pooling systems for workmen's compensation. The State of Washington has one that has been sustained by the Supreme Court, the Court saying that some of the better and more prosperous employers could be compelled to bear part of the cost of those who had a more unfavorable experience. That is the whole theory of a pooling system. Any actuary, I am sure, would be able to persuade the Senator that it would pay an employer operating a private pension system to eliminate entirely the risks arising from employing the older men.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. We have not outlawed it in this bill, and that is the point which the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Missouri were making.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator was talking about another matter altogether. He was talking about unemployment insurance. We do not attempt to deal with that on a national scale. Each State will be free to determine under what system it desires to pay unemployment insurance. That has no connection here.

There is another consideration that we have not said very much about, and I wish to invite the attention of the Senator from Missouri to it. Our country has a tremendous industrial turn-over. Suppose, to be very moderate indeed, that in the industries which adopt this system a million men are the annual turn-over.

In each individual case when a job is vacated, either voluntarily or through discharge, the board would be required to determine what amount should be paid by the employer into the Federal fund on behalf of the particular worker, or if the employee died in service the board would have to examine whether his estate received its full due. Such circumstances would require in each instance a separate investigation. How will it be possible to conduct a million investigations per year just to ascertain these facts? It would certainly be unfair not to investigate them, because some of these plans may be run loosely, and may not afford the individual worker the protection to which he is entitled.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WAGNER. I do.

Mr. CLARK. If any private plan were loosely run, it would be directly chargeable to the holy social security board set up by the Senator himself in this measure, because they are specifically charged with the responsibility of seeing that these plans are not loosely run; and since we are giving them practically powers of life and death over the population of the United States anyway, it does not seem to me too much to require that they should see that these private plans are not loosely run.

Mr. WAGNER. Even though they may not be loosely run, certainly the worker should have some assurance that he is getting all that he is entitled to get. He is not an actuary. He is not a mathematician. He is just a plain worker. He does not know whether or not he is getting the proper sum, and he is entitled to Government protection.

We had a persuasive experience upon an analogous matter in New York State. For a period of time after the workmen's compensation law was enacted—and I was largely responsible for the liberal provisions of that law—we permitted insurance companies to make private settlements with workers when they were injured. We thought that no abuses would occur, and that a proper determination would be made of the injury which a man received and of the amount of compensation to which he was entitled under the law. But very soon abuses came to the attention of the authorities. Officials and investigators themselves were frequently at fault. Wanting to make good records, they paid, for the loss of a leg, perhaps, the price of the loss of a finger. The poor worker did not know the difference. He did not know what he was entitled to, so he signed a release. The system was in existence for only about a year when the abuses were called to the attention of the legislature, and we changed the law so that the approval of the authorities must be had in each case before payment was permitted to be made.

These millions of workers, when they leave one employment and go into another, are entitled to protection, and where can enough inspectors be obtained to make investigations and report every case? I think that, as a pure matter of administration, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is an impossibility.

Besides, of course, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has pointed out, there would be no public control over the administration of the private funds of companies. A man could not be sent in every week or every month to make an investigation as to how the funds were being administered. I do not say that there would be so very many abuses; but the worker must be protected in every case.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. How does the Senator construe subsection (c) on page 3 if he says the board has no right to make inspections and follow up these matters? The subsection provides for that as specifically as the legislative drafting service was able to make it do so.

Mr. WAGNER. I am addressing myself more to the physical impossibility of doing it. I should like to agree with the Senator on his plan. I know that most of the private companies wish to be fair to their employees, but, at the same time, they all feel that they owe an obligation to their stockholders, and they are going to conduct these funds with as little expense as possible.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WAGNER. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. I was about to ask the Senator a question, but I wished to have the Senator from Missouri hear it in the hope that it might appeal to him.

This part of the bill is to go into effect in 1937, 2 years from now. Am I right in that statement?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. If we could pass the bill in this form we should have 2 years in which to study the question of amending the law and working out the safeguards that might be absolutely needed in the way of supervision, inspection, and all those things. We could study this particular proposal further, and we should have 2 years in which to make the study.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; that may very well be.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator from Missouri will acquiesce in taking that course.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator's argument answers itself. If the amendment should be accepted, and any hardship were to develop, it would always be possible to amend the act and cut out the exemption. The Senator's proposal is to wipe out these private pension systems, and then, if we find that we have done a wrong, to try to cure the wrong by amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. I know the Senator will not agree with me on that point; but I am firmly convinced that if this amendment were adopted we should find the Government holding the bag for the older men who are entitled to consideration, while the industries would take care only of the younger men who earned every bit of annuity they received. That is the danger; and in connection with this very remarkable step forward in taking care of the aged members of the community, I do not think we ought to risk, even in the slightest degree, an amendment of this character.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield one moment more?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. A while ago I referred to the plan in effect in the Socony-Vacuum Co., which gives to its employees certain very outstanding advantages above the Government plan. I am just in receipt of a telegram from Mr. Guth, of the Socony-Vacuum Co., which it seems to me answers the Senator's argument. He says:

> The average age of our company's 42,000 employees in the United States—
> Who receive these benefits, voluntarily given—
> is over 40.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; they have a particularly good record. There is no doubt about that. There are some companies which undoubtedly would administer this privilege in a way that would be of great advantage to the worker. The difficulty is that we cannot make exceptions that would let in a lot of abuses. The Senator happened to mention one company which has had an excellent system; but there are many bad ones. In addition, this bill does not abolish any system. If any employer desires to give to his employees an advantage in addition to that which is given under this bill, he is at liberty to do so. He can supplement our efforts; and let me say that I am sure that the company whose name the Senator has just read will do so—and many other companies will.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator means to say, if he will permit me, that a company may have two systems going at the same time if it desires. In other words, they are not permitted to have one system which will grant to the employees very distinct advantages, but they must go to the trouble of having two separate and distinct systems.

Mr. WAGNER. I have given the reasons why I think the amendment is dangerous. I am apprehensive of its effect upon this legislation; and the experts—who, after all, have given study and thought to this subject for a long while—all agree that this amendment is devastating to the object of the legislation.

I do not wish to make a long constitutional argument upon this question, because apparently I talked to deaf ears the other day. I tried, in my introductory address in the Senate, to cover the question and to advance the reasons why I believe that the measure is constitutional. Of course, as the Senator from Mississippi has said, all these matters ultimately will be determined by the United States Supreme Court, and we can only base our predictions upon what the Court heretofore has done.

The first question raised by the Senator from Georgia was whether the legislation embodies a public purpose. I thought we had reached the stage where we accepted this as a legal truism; that the prevention of destitution in old age and taking care of our old people who have spent their lifetimes in creating the wealth of the country, are certainly public purposes. We have so recognized by prior legislative acts. We have made appropriations to take care of many people, not only the old, but also the young who are on the point of starvation.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am not quarreling with that.

Mr. WAGNER. I understood that the Senator was.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; I am not. I do not see how the Senator could have misunderstood my statement.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator did say, as he will see if he will look back in the RECORD, that there is a question as to whether this bill embraces a public purpose.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. And I asked the Senator a question about some of the State pension laws, which certainly are based upon the theory of a public purpose.

Mr. GEORGE. It is one thing to care for the aged and the infirm out of general appropriations. It is one thing to provide general relief. It is quite a different thing, when we have a specific bill which, in my judgment, may be open to that attack, from saying that Congress has not general power for that purpose.

Mr. WAGNER. Then there is still a doubt in the Senator's mind as to whether our classification is rational and not arbitrary. Time and time again Congress has made classifications, and so long as they have been reasonable, the courts have never interfered. In many States laws which have been upheld by the courts have provided that no pension shall be paid until one is 65 years of age. That discriminates against younger men who, perhaps, would like to retire; but it is a classification which is fair and reasonable.

I am sure we all agree that one of the fundamental purposes of government is to give security to its people; and I do not think any greater contribution could be made to the happiness of our people than to give them security in old age. So I think that, so far as the question of a public purpose is concerned, there will not be much dispute.

The second question which the Senator from Georgia has raised is that the taxing power is here used indirectly to provide a social advantage or a pension for a certain class of persons.

It is argued that we cannot use the taxing power for these other purposes. Unfortunately for the argument, the courts say that we can. Long ago, when Congress passed a law taxing State bank notes, not only the ostensible reason but the conceded reason for the legislation was to drive them out of circulation. As a matter of fact, I do not think a dollar was ever collected under the imposition of that tax, but it did accomplish the purpose of destroying the notes. That act went to the Court, and the argument was made: "This measure is really not a taxing measure. The purpose of it is to drive the notes out of circulation." The Court said: "It is a proper exercise of the taxing power of Congress, and if it serves some other purpose, that does not affect its constitutionality."

The same thing is true of the Narcotic Act. That act was passed not so very long ago, in the form of a tax measure, but other purposes were tied in with it, among them a health purpose. The act was attacked upon the ground that the tax was a mere pretext. The Court declined to consider that objection, and said:

> An act may not be declared unconstitutional because its effect may be to accomplish another purpose as well as the raising of revenue.

Then there is the oleomargarine case. And while the question has not yet been passed upon by the Supreme Court, the circuit courts of appeals have upheld the processing tax, although the act embodying it concededly has objectives other than the levying of a tax.

The final question which the Senator from Georgia has raised is that we are only calling upon a certain class of our citizens to pay the tax, which goes into the Federal Treasury, and in time will be used in part to finance the payment of pensions.

I think that is a fair classification. I think it can be justified easily, because the employer gets a special benefit from the pension law. Of course, the public generally is benefited by the prevention of destitution; but specifically the employer is benefited, because it is now a recognized fact that more security to the worker improves his efficiency.

In New York State we had experience along that line after the workmen's compensation law was enacted. A survey was made 3 or 4 years later; and it was shown that, excluding the question of new labor-saving machinery, the productivity per worker actually increased, although at the same time hours were shortened. As I have said, experience has very definitely shown, and I do not think anyone will contradict me on this, that in affording the employee better conditions of life, better sanitary conditions, and security in old age, the employer makes a happy and contented worker and thus increases his productivity. Therefore, it seems to me that the classification is perfectly fair, since employers will get benefits greater than the benefits which the common run of citizens will receive.

I think these are the questions which the Senator raised. I know the Senator did not contend that the proposed act would be unconstitutional; he merely indicated his grave doubts about it. On the contrary, I feel very confident that the proposed legislation will run the gantlet of the courts; and of course it has the approval of the overwhelming sentiment of the country.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not wish to say anything about the merits of the bill or to discuss its constitutionality, but I rise to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. About 2 weeks ago I offered a similar amendment, which the committee considered. I am advised by the members of the committee that they were very sympathetic to the exemption contained in the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, as well as the amendment proposed by me.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I stated a while ago, during the absence of the Senator, that my amendment was lost only on a tie vote when there was a very slim attendance of the committee, when a quorum of the committee was not actually present; in other words, lost on a vote of 5 to 5 in the committee. There were a great many more experts present than members of the committee.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand those who voted against the amendment voted in that way because they thought that with the exemption in the bill it would make the bill unconstitutional.

I wish to speak primarily of the merits of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. Long before this matter was agitated by the States or by the National Government, some forward-looking concerns, having the interests of the workingman at heart, and realizing that a contented worker was a good investment, set up insurance plans, particularly old-age and retirement plans.

In my State there are any number of such plans which are working efficiently. The United Railways, in Baltimore City, having about 4,000 employees, has such a system, and I have learned from the lips of the employees themselves that it works splendidly, and they would prefer, at least for the present, to have the company insurance feature retained, rather than to have a Federal law enacted. Probably later on if the national law turns out as its authors think it will, they may want to abandon their own scheme and come in under the national scheme, but for the time being they have confidence in the insurance plan set up by the United Railways of Baltimore. There are a number of other plants, employing thousands of people, which have similar old-age-retirement set-ups to take care of those who would be taken care of by the Federal Government under the proposed law.

As a matter of policy, is it wise to wipe out in one fell swoop these successful insurance set-ups, and substitute one that is only on trial, to say the least? Would it not be better to exempt them for the time being, and then, if we find the Government plan to be a success, as everyone hopes it will be, to legislate again later on? That is what the employees in the concerns themselves want, and I can see no harm, certainly at this juncture, in making an exemption in this case, so that where there is contentment, and where the employee finds that he is protected against the vicissitudes of old age to his own satisfaction, that scheme may be kept in existence until the proposed plan can demonstrate its good fruits.

Mr. President, that is basically what the amendment of the Senator from Missouri would do. It would not change the philosophy of the bill. It provides only that where, after a review, it is felt that the agency in the private system is comparable with the set-up proposed on the part of the Federal Government, it shall receive a certificate of exemption from the provisions of the proposed act. What harm could be done? As I understand, the agency certified must be as good as the agency proposed to be set up by the Federal Government in order to get the exemption certificate. It may be better.

Some of these annuity systems have been built up for 25 or 30 years. Fortunately, where physical examination is an incident to employment, and where there is little drain on the fund, the amount of money built up in reserve far exceeds that which would be built up in the ordinary run of labor employment. Therefore, what earthly harm can there be, until the proposed act shall have been tried out, in letting the concerns to which I have referred, which are already doing what the Federal Government would do, retain their own systems, until the Federal system shall have been promulgated and placed in full operation?

If it turns out that private systems of any business organizations are falling below the standard which the Government wants established, we can legislate at a later date and say, "You are not doing as well as the Federal Government is requiring other concerns to do, and therefore we will have to legislate you out of business."

Certainly at this juncture, when the plans referred to are the only voluntary old-age-insurance schemes in existence; and since they are satisfactory to both employer and employee, it seems to me that the weight of logic is that for the present we should make an exemption; and if subsequent events prove it to be unwise we can correct it.

Let us consider the other alternative. Suppose we do not allow this exemption; suppose we wipe out all these benefits; all these annuity funds which have been created; and we find that our scheme is not working as well as the private schemes are working at this moment; that for some unexpected reason the lack of taxes, a new depression, or for any other reason the Federal scheme becomes impracticable. We would have wiped out all the insurance systems in the meantime, and we could not go back then and reestablish them. Their reserves would have been liquidated, and concerns would have been disorganized, insofar as the insurance features were concerned, and we would have many people, perhaps, on the relief rolls, whereas if we had made this exemption the companies themselves could have taken charge of them.

I do not believe the Federal Government ought to discourage legitimate business in trying to cooperate with labor for the best interests of labor in providing a retirement fund when the laborer shall have reached the age of 65 years and has rendered efficient service.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would not the argument of the Senator be met, however, by limiting this amendment to systems already in existence? The amendment of the Senator from Missouri invites the establishment of new systems for the purpose of avoiding the requirements of the Federal plan.

Mr. TYDINGS. I personally should like to see the exemption as the Senator from Missouri has it in his amendment; but I should be satisfied, I may say to the Senator from Texas, if the amendment were restricted to apply only to concerns now having such systems in existence.

Mr. CONNALLY. After the establishment of the Federal system there is no reason why everybody should not come in, except for the temptation to devise a system by which employers might think they could save money.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator from Missouri were to restrict his amendment, I should not object to it at all. My concern at this time is bottomed primarily on the fact that where these agencies are already in existence, and they are doing as good a job as the Federal Government expects to do, or in some cases a better job, and it is desired that they remain in existence until the Federal law can be promulgated and proven, they are well within their rights in saying, "We did this 25 or 30 years before the proposal ever came to Congress; our plan is a success; it is as good as the plan which the Federal Government itself intends to set up, or better, and we ask only that for the time being we be given an exemption."

What harm can be done by giving such an exemption? The private agency must be doing as good a job as the Government expects to do in order to get its exemption certificate. If the private system were inferior to that which the Federal Government would set up, it would be a different proposition; but where they are already carrying out not only the intent but the substance of the law, and have been doing so for 25 or 30 years, and when we have been urging employers to do this very thing, it strikes me it would be discouraging to industry and to employees alike to have that effort wiped out in one fell swoop.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to invite the attention of the Senator from Maryland, and the Senate, to the fact that the Federal Government itself is exempted under the provisions of this bill. It is the largest employer in the country, and it is exempted. I should blush, I am sure every Member of the Senate would blush, if he thought the Federal Government was requiring from industry or from other employers advantages which it was not willing to grant to its own employees. The Federal Government is exempting itself under the operations of this bill for the reason that we have already in effect a better retirement and annuity plan than is provided in this bill for general labor.

Certain religious bodies, notably the Presbyterian Church, are exempted under the provisions of this bill by reason of the fact—and it can be the only reason—that they already have in effect a much more liberal and more meritorious plan.

If the Federal Government, the Presbyterian Church, and other religious bodies are to be exempted, why should not other employers who desire to do the same thing be exempted?

Mr. TYDINGS. In my judgment, the Senator's argument is unanswerable.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the object of this bill is to levy the tax on organizations which are set up for profit. The Presbyterian Church or any other organization under it is not a profit-making institution, and, therefore, the Government does not desire to tax it in order that it may set up a fund of this sort. It would be utterly inconsistent for the Government of the United States to tax itself in order to raise funds in a way similar to the way the tax is levied on private industry. It is not a question of whether there has already been established a retirement system which is better than the one we are setting up for private industry, or whether the Federal Government plan will be better than a plan which some private institution or agency already has in operation.

It seems to me there would be no logic in undertaking to put the Federal Government, or a church, or even a State, which is a political division of the Nation, on the same basis as that on which we would put a corporation which is employing men, out of whom it makes a profit. It seems to me there is no analogy between those situations.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not altogether agree with the Senator from Kentucky. The purpose of the bill, as I understand, is to declare a new policy in this Nation; namely, that when people arrive at the age of 65 years they shall have, in effect, the right to retire. It does not make any difference whether they are preachers, or doctors in a hospital, or workers in a steel mill, or conductors on the street cars. If our general policy is to take people off the work list when they have arrived at 65 years of age there is no earthly reason why the Federal Government or the Presbyterian Church or any other body should have an exemption, unless every other concern which is already providing age retirement should have an equal right, particularly when it is maintaining a better system or pays more than is proposed to be paid by the Federal Government.

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. LONG rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. TYDINGS. I first yield to the Senator from Kentucky. Then I will yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if we were establishing a general old-age-pension system applicable to all when they reach a certain age, of course we should have to provide the money out of general taxation. We could not tax a church, we could not tax the Federal Government, because neither has anything upon which to levy a tax. If we are ever to embark upon a general old-age-pension system applicable to everybody, we may have to abolish any special taxes to raise funds on the part of employers, and pay the pensions out of money in the Treasury raised by general taxation.

However, this bill does not contemplate any such step as that, though it may come some day; but it has been felt that this is as far as we can go now in undertaking to make employees and employers contribute to a fund for old-age pensions.

Mr. TYDINGS. I see the point of the Senator from Kentucky; and, as I have said, I do not wholly disagree with him. I think, however, the Senator from Kentucky will be fair enough to say that the main purpose of the bill is not to levy a tax on anybody. The main purpose of the bill is to provide retirement for people who have reached the age when they can no longer work. If that is the case, there is no reason why anybody should be exempted; and if exemptions are to be made for the Government, or for the Presbyterian Church, or for an organization which has provided its own retirement agency, then it strikes me that concerns which have provided retirement agencies comparable or superior to that which is envisaged by the bill should receive an exemption, at least temporarily, until the fruits of the bill can be tested in the light of experience.

Mr. LONG rose.

Mr. TYDINGS. I desire to make further answer to the Senator from Kentucky before I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

What is the title of the act?—

An act to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits—

And so forth. That ought to apply to the preachers the same as to anybody else. I am sure the Senator from Kentucky does not desire to have the ministers left out of this system.

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

Mr. TYDINGS. I agree with him that we cannot tax the congregation to make its particular contribution to this fund; but indirectly we tax the congregation, because it consumes the things which all the concerns covered by this bill make; and, therefore, if we tax them, the congregation bears the indirect if not the direct tax.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, my contention is that whenever we shall establish an old-age-pension system for everybody we will have to pay for it by general taxation. We cannot levy a tax on the Ford Motor Co. to pay old-age pensions to its own employees and also to the Presbyterian preacher and the school teacher. We cannot levy an employer's tax on the Baldwin Locomotive Works in order to pension somebody who does not work for the Baldwin Locomotive Works. So whenever we decide to pension everybody who is over 65 years of age we must levy a general tax on everybody, subject to tax.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I will answer that statement in a moment. Now I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, has the Senator from Maryland any figures showing how much is being paid in pensions under the private employers' system?

Mr. TYDINGS. I did have some figures. I do not know how accurate they were. I do not have them available. Perhaps the Senator from Missouri has them.

Mr. LONG. Has the Senator from New York such figures?

Mr. WAGNER. I have not the figures, but I will say that there are only 2,000,000 employees under pension systems today.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am surprised there are so many.

Mr. LONG. If there are 2,000,000 persons under pension systems today, I will say that that is more than will be accommodated under the proposed act.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, according to the 1930 census there are 48,000,000 people of working age in this country. From that number we must eliminate, first of all, many millions engaged in agriculture.

We also must eliminate those who are engaged in transportation, particularly on the railroads, almost all of which have a pension system. We also must eliminate most of those who work in the steel mills. When we add all the municipal and State employees who are under merit systems and retirement acts, I shall be very much surprised if the number does not far exceed the 2,000,000 which the Senator from New York gives.

Mr. WAGNER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course, I did not include public employees.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the Senator must concede that the 48,000,000 also includes those who work for the Government, so if he is going to state one part of the proposition for one purpose he ought to state the other part of the proposition for the other purpose.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I will put what I wish to present in the form of a question. If we had what we knew was a compensatory pension system which actually covered all persons beyond a certain age when they should retire from labor, that would be one thing; but we know that this bill is necessarily confined by reason of the amount of money involved, if by no other reason, to a very small number of those who reach that age; and we are about to destroy the private system. I concede the private system to have some faults; but nonetheless, with a far more faulty system we are about to destroy a system which is taking care of a far greater number of people on a pension roll. Not only that, but I may add to the Senator from Maryland that this bill prescribes that only the needy, the paupers, may get a pension.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not desire the Senator to take too much of my time.

Mr. WAGNER. I think the Senator from Louisiana is mistaken in the statement he has just made.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is talking about unemployment insurance?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. LONG. I was talking about pensions.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us take the argument made by the Senator from Kentucky in regard to the Presbyterian ministers. The Senator from Kentucky very properly says that the congregation or the employers, so to speak, do not pay any tax into this fund, and, therefore, the preacher who has retired should not receive any of the benefits out of this fund, and therefore that it is a proper exemption.

By direct analogy, does not that apply to the company which is exempted? It receives no benefits from this fund. It pays into its own fund, and, therefore, why should it not be exempted? It does not cost the Government a 5-cent piece to maintain insurance agencies which are now in existence; and if they provide their own funds and pay their own benefits, why should they pay into a Federal fund?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. We are dealing now with private corporations engaged in the employment of men for profit. I do not believe we can have a successful national pension system while at the same time exempting those who may set up their own system and who may be subject to high-pressure salesmanship on the part of agents of annuity or insurance companies coming around and telling them that they can establish their own system and save money over and above what they would pay into the Federal Government. I think ultimately it would tend to break down the national system, for the only prospect of success in this national system is that it shall be universal. If it is going to have any competition in the field on the part of private annuity companies and insurance companies, it will be a failure to that extent.

Mr. TYDINGS. Basically the Senator from Kentucky and I are not far apart. What we think is the direct purpose of the bill, in effect, is to compel every employer in the country who employs more than 10 men——

Mr. BARKLEY. As the bill now reads, more than four men.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well; more than four men. The direct purpose is to compel such employer to enter into a system of retirement insurance whereby his employees will receive the benefit of it when they reach a certain age. The modus operandi in that case is by taxes, but the purpose is to compel them all to insure their workingmen. I am not quarreling with that; but the way to compel them to do that is by taxing them, taking the money and putting it into the system, whether they want it or not. If they are already doing that, if they are already paying benefits either equal or superior to those set up by the bill, then why should not the Government let them alone, for they are already doing what the Federal Government through its taxing power is trying to make the other concerns do that have not heretofore done it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall yield to the Senator in just a moment. I submit to the Senator from Kentucky that if every employer employing more than four people now had this kind of insurance system, this bill would not be here. The only reason this bill is here is that most concerns have not set up such a system of insurance, and this is an attempt by the taxing power to compel them to set up that sort of a system.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Those concerns which now have their own private system which is as beneficial to the employee as would be the system we are proposing to set up will lose nothing by going into the Federal system, for it would cost them no more, if they are already paying into such a fund. So they will not be harmed by being required to go in. If they have a system that is better than the proposed Government system, then they can go into this system and still supplement their old system by whatever excess of good they are now engaged in doing toward their employees. So they will not be hurt.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is a fair concession from the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am always fair.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator said inferentially that where the system which is now in existence under private concerns is better than that which the Federal Government attempts to set up he hopes they will go ahead with it, but he is unwilling to give them any exemption to go ahead with a plan which is better than the Federal Government's plan.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know that there are any such concerns; I am assuming that there may be.

Mr. TYDINGS. I can tell the Senator that there are.

Mr. BARKLEY. If there are, there is nothing in this proposed law that will prevent them from going ahead with their unusual generosity toward their employees.

Mr. TYDINGS. The bill provides, we will say, $30-a-month old-age retirement pensions. In Baltimore the United Railways, I think, pay their men $50-a-month retirement pay; yet that is to be wiped out. In other words, those men who have looked forward all their lives to getting $50 a month when they are retired are to be cut down to $30 a month; and yet this bill is in the interest of labor.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator will concede that there is nothing in this bill that prevents such a concern from supplementing this tax so as to make it $50 a month?

Mr. TYDINGS. If we are going to give them the right to do it anyhow, in a supplementary form, why not let the system which is better than the proposed Government system stay?

Mr. BARKLEY. Because we cannot have a successful patchwork system; it has got to be universal and uniform in order to be successful.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think it has got to be "uniform." The Senator's own words belie that, I think, because he says if the system now in existence is better than the one to be provided by the Federal Government he hopes there will be supplemental action; so it will not be uniform.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator cannot take advantage of a mere expression. What I was talking about was uniformity in the minimum requirement of the Federal statute as to the Federal system. Any concern which desires to go beyond that may do it; any concern which desires to continue its present system may do it in full. It might not want to do it, and, I dare say, would not want to do it, but it may do it if it wants to.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am going to make a suggestion to the Senator from Kentucky and to others who may do me the honor to listen to me. My prediction is—and mark this well, Senators—that if the exemption is not granted, if individual concerns do not have the right to set up their own insurance systems, if they are compelled to conform to the letter and spirit of this proposed national law, what will happen will be that they will liquidate their present insurance systems, go under the Federal law, and the workers will get less money than they would get if the exemption were granted. The concerns having private systems will say, "That is the Federal standard; we have lived up to the Federal standard, and therefore, gentlemen, although we did have a system, the Federal law has wiped it out; we feel we have done our part; we told the Congress that we would like an exemption, but the Federal Congress did not care to grant it to us, even though our system was better than that the Federal Congress had in mind; and now that they have wiped out our own agencies, we will just go along with the Federal agency."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Where there is 1 private institution which is providing a better system than this bill would provide there are 400 which are not providing systems that do as well.

Mr. TYDINGS. All this amendment seeks to do is to exempt those that are doing as well or doing better than the bill requires that they shall all do; and what reason there can be for failing to grant an exemption in such a case I do not know.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator has very consistently urged for many years his opposition to an army of Federal inspectors going out all over the country.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is correct as to that.

Mr. BARKLEY. But if we exempt all these private concerns, it will take another army of Federal inspectors, going all the time, to ascertain whether they are living up to the standard.

Mr. TYDINGS. I approach this matter with the positive view that if we are going to establish a uniform law, and wipe out all private initiative, we shall be laying the foundation of real bureaucracy. So long as we leave the door open for private initiative, particularly that which has established itself for 25 or 30 years, we encourage the employer to take care of his employees, which he is doing now better than would be done under the proposed Federal Government. I predict that this bill is only the first step on the stairs, and the Members of this Chamber—and I am not taking sides on the matter; I am merely making an observation—will see the day, particularly if there are no exemptions granted, when we will have a uniform retirement law for all the workers of this country, regardless of their health, regardless of their salaries, regardless of their savings or income, or anything else, just as certain as that the sun rises and sets. That will be the first real bureaucracy that we will have under this bill. What I am proposing to do is to keep the Federal Government from interfering with private organizations which are already doing as well as this bill, if enacted, would compel them all to do. I would rather see this done voluntarily all over the country than to have the Federal Government in it at all, were it possible to have it done voluntarily.

I take it for granted that the only reason we have this bill before us today is that certain concerns will not insure their employees, and, therefore, the time has come when Congress desires to compel them to do it; but why should those concerns which have for 25 or 30 years built up their own insurance agencies, which are doing better than the plan which this bill proposes to do, be wiped out? Why should they not be given an exemption? What harm could it do?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Maryland has expired on the amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well, I will speak on the bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I believe that Andrew Carnegie was a good business man. He established a retirement fund for college professors. My information is that there is very little left of that fund.

If some particular business institution employing labor exempted from the provisions of this bill should not manage and supervise the reserve fund better than has been done in the case of the Andrew Carnegie fund and the private industrial company's pension fund should go the way of the Andrew Carnegie fund, what would happen to those dependent upon it? Undoubtedly the establishment of the fund was a good thing for Andrew Carnegie; he got a lot of college professors to carry out his ideas; but where does it leave the professors, and how does it affect the United States?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Carnegie Institute was a charitable institution, pure and simple.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment. The Federal Government had not any say in the world over Mr. Carnegie's fund, but under this amendment the industrial concern would only be exempted if its plan in operation was equivalent to or better than that to be provided by the Federal Government. So that the power of supervision, the right to take away their exemption certificates and compel them to do this or that or the other thing in order to retain their exemption certificates, would always lodge in the Federal board. So the Senator's analogy, in my judgment, is not an accurate one.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does not the Senator think there should be some supervision over private institutions, if they are to be exempted from the provisions of the bill, so the fund would be protected from dissipation and investment in worthless securities?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have no objection to that; in fact, I would encourage it. I should like to see the funds invested in the strongest and safest possible way. In many States, including my own, such funds can be invested only in that kind of security which is approved by the court; and under that plan there has been little or no loss, because the court will only approve National or State bonds, or city or county bonds which are in good standing. I suppose that system is in existence in other States so that trust funds can be invested only in securities approved by the court. I know in the majority of States of the Union that is the law.

Mr. President, I now return to the question with which I opened my remarks. Can there be any harm done to the proposed retirement system if the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is accepted? No; there cannot be, because in order to be excepted or exempted the private retirement agency must be equal or superior in its benefits to the agency set up or the standard fixed by the Federal Government. The workingman is better off, or at least as well off, under the private insurance agency as he would be under the Federal Government.

In view of that fact—and when the law is in its initial stages, when it has not had a chance to operate—what harm can there be in keeping the demonstrated institutions which have proven real strength and real benefit and real consideration for the workingman on the part of those who have employed him? What harm can there be in giving them a temporary exemption until the fruits of the law may be ascertained? If anyone can show me where the workingman will be any worse off, I shall not have another word to utter. Thus far no one on this floor has been able to offer a single scintilla of evidence to show that the workingman will be any worse off under this exemption than under the terms of the bill. On the contrary, it is conceded that in cases he will be better off under the exemption than if he is forced to come under the terms of the bill.

If these facts be true, and I believe they are true, then why not grant the exemption until we can observe the workings of the law for a year or two, and then if we see that it comes up to our expectations, that private systems are no longer to be considered in connection with this phase of work in human activity, we can wipe them out. But is it not the part of wisdom, and is it not the part of caution, and is it not the part of vision to retain something that is a success until we can find out whether the promulgated measure shall bear the very lovely fruit which its sponsors think it will?

That is all the amendment seeks to do. It simply provides that where a system is operating and paying benefits equal to those set up in the bill, or better than those provided in the bill, then the board shall grant to such private agency a certificate of exemption. The board can revoke the certificate whenever the private system falls below the standard, but so long as it is operating in a fashion equal or superior to the plan proposed by the bill, it shall be granted that exemption.

I have not heard anyone yet offer any objection to the amendment except that we ought to make the system uniform, even if making it uniform takes from some workingman some benefits which he would have if the exemption were granted.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator is losing sight of the cardinal principle behind most of this type of legislation, namely, that all the beneficiaries must look to the Federal Government and not to local or private agencies. The theory is we must centralize here in the Federal Government. Of course, we cannot argue against that because we want to wipe out all the States and all their rights and have everything all centered here in Washington!

Mr. TYDINGS. In conclusion, let me submit this pertinent fact for the consideration of the Senate. Bear in mind, Senators, that when this measure was pending before the Finance Committee, the committee divided evenly on whether they should adopt the amendment or should not adopt it. The Finance Committee was very close to adopting it, and I understand from some of those who did not support it in committee that at that time they opposed it solely on the ground that they were afraid it might call into question the constitutionality of the measure. Inasmuch as since that time other exemptions have been granted, why in the name of heaven should not this exemption be granted when it does as much for the workingman or more for the workingman than the provisions of the bill?

This is one of the times when the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], who is said by many to be the best friend that labor has in Congress, is trying to take benefits away from the workingman which he would otherwise have, and when I, who am sometimes said to be not friendly to labor, am trying to hold for the workingman the benefits which he already has under private agencies. The Senator from New York does not say the amendment would make the bill unconstitutional.

I only ask that where private industry over a long period of years has established a system which gives to the workingman more than the Federal Government can give him under the bill, let us give that exemption to such industry so that the fruits of retirement may be full rather than meager, which will be the effect if the amendment shall not be adopted.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator answer a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Would not the natural thing be for big concerns that have already put into operation pension plans, when the Federal Government adopts this plan, simply to say, "We do not care to compete with the Government, and hence our pension plan is at an end"?

Mr. TYDINGS. I should think so. The predicition which I made previously, and which I now restate, is that if the bill shall be passed and there shall be no exemption, then private concerns will liquidate their annuity funds, and there will be established a uniform standard over the country which, if no exemptions are granted, will result, in the case of millions of employees, in their receiving a lesser annuity than they would have received had the exemptions been granted.

Mr. LONG. I wish to say, referring to the $50 about which the Senator from Maryland spoke, that I have two or three good friends who are drawing $100 a month. I think my friend Moran, who served his time with the Standard Oil Co., today draws $100 a month under their pension plan. I do not understand why anyone should oppose it. Let us not now destroy these private systems.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me interrupt the Senator to say that in the little village in which I have lived, Havre de Grace, Md., there recently died a man who had been a telegraph operator. He had worked for the Pennsylvania Railroad for about 35 or 40 years, I believe. When he retired he received a pension of something over $50 a month. Under the terms of the bill, if that system had been wiped out, that poor fellow would have been getting, assuming he would have lived 5 or 10 years more, only $30 a month instead of the $50 a month which he had built up for himself over a long term of years with the railroad company. I submit that it smacks of injustice when this man, who had looked forward all those years to a definite sum of money which he would have gotten under that system, would have been compelled under the Federal retirement plan contemplated by this bill to take a much less sum.

In conclusion, I predict again if we pass the bill without exemption that many Senators will find millions of laboring men who are going to be very much displeased, because I believe there will be millions who will get less under the compulsory retirement standard set by the bill than they now expect to enjoy under the pension plans of private industry.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, further on this line let me say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LONG. I can use my own time to make this statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I have not heard anyone advocating this bill who does not doubt its constitutionality.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator mean the amendment?

Mr. LONG. No; I am talking about the bill. Everyone doubts the constitutionality of the bill. Even the proponents of the bill doubt it. I desire to say to them that they not only have a right to doubt it but I do not believe it is possible for the bill as it is now written to be held constitutional. I would bet everything I have on it. I do not mean that it will be held unconstitutional by a divided court, either. We need not worry about the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that it will take six to three to declare a law unconstitutional. Not one out of nine will uphold the constitutionality of this measure, any more than one out of nine upheld the constitutionality of the N. R. A. Not a single member of the Supreme Court of the United States will hold this bill constitutional as now written.

What is it that the bill proposes? It is not a tax in order to decentralize wealth. It is not a tax in order to serve the common welfare. This is a pension system established by the Government. That is what it is—an unemployment system established by the Government. We cannot put a tail on one end of it and a head on the other end of it and make it anything else, and it does not necessarily depend upon any interstate transactions in order to have its constitutionality maintained.

If this bill is going to be sustained, all well and good; but let us not wipe out pension systems that are doing good. There will be hundreds and thousands of people who will become eligible for the private pensions that they have earned long before this bill is held to be constitutional or unconstitutional; but if it finally goes into effect, and the private concerns wipe out their private pension systems, and the pensions of men who are drawing $100 a month are wiped out on the ground that they should have $30, and then they do not get the $30, and we have destroyed the private pension systems, the harm will have been done in two ways. The first is, we shall have given no pensions at all. The second is, we shall have destroyed a private system that may have considerable merit and may have some faults.

Let me say one thing further, Mr. President. I have no particular faith in the good will of any corporation, except such as is necessary to its own interest. I am wholly in favor of the regulations that are imposed in this particular amendment upon private pension systems; but I think I see chances for far less harm under the amendment that is proposed than I do under the regular bill, because we must bear in mind the fact that there is a very small contribution made, to begin with, by the Federal Government. That is one thing. We must bear in mind the further fact that it is left within the province of the various and sundry boards that are in control of the several functions under the several titles of the bill to discontinue the system as prevailing and as maintained in certain localities whenever they desire to do so; and there is just as much room—aye, more—there is more practical room for abuse, and in effect it will be found that in many instances there is more abuse, in a publicly administered system of this kind than there is in privately administered systems of this kind.

Under this particular amendment, the abuse of the private system can be controlled. The Government can step in and prevent abuse in a private system, but it cannot step in and prevent abuse in the public system, nor can it breathe life into concerns destroyed by a law which may be unconstitutional—aye, which is unconstitutional if I know anything about the law. I venture the assertion that the enactment of the bill without the amendment will mean the wiping out of whatever good has been done under the private systems, and no good will be done under the system proposed here. So let us try the plan contemplated by the amendment.

What harm can be done? We meet here every year. Let us get this public pension system or public unemployment system to working. Let us see what good it does. Let us have it held constitutional if it can be held constitutional, which it never will be, but let us have it held constitutional before we wipe out the pensions of millions and millions of employees under the private systems. When it is held constitutional, and when it is proved to be reasonably workable, that will be time enough to talk about destroying the private pension systems.

We have plenty of time to do that. When we find that we have a baby here that is able to walk, and then is able to stand alone, we shall have something on which we can base our good judgment to destroy the private pension systems; but let us not destroy a system that is now accommodating many more millions of persons than our own program may accommodate, and a system that is paying more money than this system will pay, and risk it all subject to the hazard that what we are doing here may be either ineffectual or invalid when it reaches the Court.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. I recognize that upon its face it has much appeal; but, as stated by the Senator from Mississippi, after most careful consideration in the committee I came to the conclusion, as did a number of other Senators who had previously been inclined to favor the amendment, that its adoption would very seriously undermine this particular title of the act, namely, the old-age benefit title.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has just made a statement which I believe to be correct. I should like to have him elaborate his thought on that subject if he chooses to do so, and explain why, in his opinion, the adoption of this amendment exempting existing arrangements and institutions will undermine and impair the effectiveness of the proposed Federal system for retirement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be glad to attempt to do that, Mr. President.

In the discussion here this afternoon it has been quite evident that many Senators are laboring under the impression that all the existing private pension plans are of a high standard, and that they confer great benefits upon the employees covered by them. The contrary is the fact. Most of the plans which are now in existence do not bring, in the end, great benefits to the aged employees. This is conclusively shown by the fact, as brought out in the record before the committee, that, while there are now approximately some 2,000,000 employees under private plans other than those of railroad companies, only approximately 165,000 persons are drawing any retirement benefits under industrial pension plans and half of these are under railroad company plans. This salient fact is a clear indication that there must be something wrong with plans which have succeeded in bringing benefits and payments to only about 4 percent of those who are under those plans.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The statement has been repeatedly made on the floor this afternoon by at least one Senator that the number of workers who are now receiving benefits from private arrangements for retirement far exceeds the number that may receive benefits under this measure. I have been unable to reconcile that declaration with my knowledge of the facts. What are the facts in that particular?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the best information I can obtain, refreshing my recollection, is that there will be approximately 25,000,000 people under this Federal plan if it is not impaired by the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. ROBINSON. And the number now is said to be 2,000,000?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Two million.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood as criticizing or not giving full credit to the employers who have attempted to set up these plans; but I wish to point out that the plans are not so beneficial, so far as the employees are concerned, as many Senators seem to feel, as I judge from the discussion which has taken place here this afternoon.

It is stated by those who are supporting this amendment that no harm can result, insofar as title II is concerned, if we permit private plans to be approved which give benefits equal to those contemplated under the Federal system.

On its face, if we do not analyze that statement any further, it is an appealing one; but the fact is that if this amendment shall be adopted, inevitably employers will study the various advantages from a financial standpoint as between the system set up in title II—the Federal system—and a private plan. That is inevitable. Therefore, to start with, if we shall adopt this amendment the Government, having determined to set up a Federal system of old-age benefits, will provide in its own bill creating that system, for competition, which in the end may destroy the Federal system; and I submit that no Senator approaching this problem from a logical, businesslike point of view could for a moment believe that to be a sound public policy.

If this amendment should be agreed to and the employer should sit down to compare the Federal system, as provided in title II, with the system being urged upon him by some insurance broker, one of two things would inevitably result. Either he would decide that it was better for him to employ only those in the younger age groups and to provide a system embracing all his employees under a private plan, or he would employ a fair share of the older men but do all in his power to encourage the older employees in his employment to elect to come under the Government plan, so that under either course he would be able to provide as liberal benefits as the Federal system without paying as much for them, because the Federal system would have to carry the older workers.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he is not really making an argument against the whole bill—that is, against all the provisions under discussion? If employers are going to assume the attitude the Senator thinks they will assume with reference to the privilege which would be accorded them under this amendment, will they not also try to escape just as much taxes as they can, and will they not also try to get just as much service as they can for every dollar they expend, and will they not also use every bit of labor-saving machinery they can possibly employ?

If the Senator's hypothesis is correct that our industries are going to try to take advantage of an amendment which they themselves certainly may desire, is not the Senator making an argument against the whole bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, Mr. President; I do not see that point, if I may say so to the Senator, because the tax provided is uniform.

Mr. GEORGE. I know it is uniform, but if the employees are going to assume the attitude assumed by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from New York and other Senators, will not the American business man, actuated by such selfish motives and impulses as have been here ascribed to him, try to get the maximum service, the maximum production, out of every laborer to whom he is paying a wage, to the end that his excise tax, which is measured by his pay roll, will be just as little as possible for the amount of work which is done, and will he not be influenced and induced to employ a younger man who can work more and harder, and perhaps can turn out more product that the older employee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Unfortunately, Mr. President, without any tax at all; that has been the tendency of industry under the pressure of economic conditions. But I do not want to be a party to making an additional inducement for further lowering the average hiring age in the United States, for I may say to the Senator that the situation which confronts employees between the ages of 40 or 45 and beyond is becoming one of the most serious problems which this country is now called upon to solve.

Mr. GEORGE. I fully agree with the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is aware of the fact that during the depression, a man 40, 45, or going on 50 years of age, no matter how well preserved he might be, has found it very difficult to secure reemployment in competition with younger persons.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I must not trespass on the Senator's time, but permit me to say that I know that to be true, and I know that the Senator is not making an argument against the bill; but it does seem to me that an argument against the amendment is an argument against the whole philosophy of the bill. I do not share the view that American industries as a whole will undertake to take advantage of this amendment, and will employ only young men, because their obligation would be the same as it is under the plan set out in the bill. But if the Senator is correct, it seems to me that we might as well accept as an established fact in the beginning that the same selfish motives will induce the American employer to hire and employ the young man who can produce more per hour than the old man. Remember, the employer's tax is measured by his pay roll, and that will also induce him to use every bit of labor-saving machinery he can put into his establishment. If selfishness is the driving motive of all American business, it seems to me the Senator's argument is against the whole bill as much as it is against the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not see that, because the amendment sets up a situation whereby one of two things, as I started to say, will result; either the employer will elect to hire only people in the younger age group and will put the whole group of employees under the private plan, because hiring them in the lower age group the employer will be able to secure his annuities at a cheaper rate; or if he elects to keep some of his older employees he will urge them, he will use all his persuasive and his economic power to get them, to elect to take their benefits under the Federal system; and if that shall be the eventuality, then the Federal system will be carrying all the heavier risk, because it will have the older groups, which are more expensive to carry.

I can understand Senators being completely against the objectives which are outlined in the pending social-security bill; I can understand their position, although I do not agree with it; but it seems to me that all Senators who regard the objectives of this title as being sound public policy should hesitate long ere they accept an amendment which will tend to break down and to destroy the effectiveness and the success of the Federal old-age-benefit system.

The Senator from Maryland urged that by adopting this amendment we should give an opportunity to employees and employers to elect to continue under their present private plan, but to leave it open for them later to come in under the Federal system if they wish to do so. That, it seems to me, is an argument which will not stand analysis for a moment. Let us take the case of the United Railways in Baltimore, cited by the Senator from Maryland. It might be very advantageous to them to stay out of the proposed system for a number of years, until they have relatively more aged employees than they now have, and then to dump them over onto the Federal system, but thereby they would burden and help to upset the actuarial basis of the Federal system; and, if it were done in a large number of instances, such practices would upset it altogether.

Much has been said in the debate about destroying the existing plan. So far as I know, there is not a private pension plan in the United States which will not have to be revised if the bill shall become a law, whether the amendment of the Senator from Missouri shall be agreed to or not. Everyone of them will have to be changed to meet the requirements of this amendment, and it is just as easy for those socially minded employers who desire to add additional benefits to the plan now proposed in title II of the bill to revise their existing plans so as to offer benefits in addition to those provided in title II as it is for them to revise them in order to take advantage of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, if it shall be agreed to.

Reference has also been made in the debate to the situation confronting employees who have been under these plans, and it has been argued that if the bill becomes a law those upon the verge of retirement may lose all of their benefits. Unfortunately, that happens all too often under private pension plans. But the employers who have systems which are upon a sound basis, and which have any social justification at all, have established reserves for their individual employees. To say that such employers would use the enactment of the pending bill as a justification for refusing to pay the beneficiaries of the reserves which have been contributed by employees and employers over a long period of time is to make an indictment of the integrity of these forward-looking industrial leaders which I would not make upon the floor of the Senate or in any other place. If there be any such unscrupulous employers, the individual employee has not a Chinaman's chance with them anyway, because when he got up to within a few months of the time when he would be entitled to the benefit provided, he would be discharged by the employer and would lose his benefits.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Assuming what the Senator says to be so, then what harm can there be in granting them an exemption, if they build up these reserves, and the benefits are superior to those contemplated by the bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have already pointed out a number of reasons why I think it is an unwise policy. The Senator was not in the Chamber when I covered those points, and as my time is limited, I beg him to excuse me from going over the ground again.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask the Senator one other question, which I think is apropos the point of which he is now speaking?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator said that he had covered the point to which I referred. Did the Senator say there would be harm in granting these exemptions?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then, I will read the Senator's remarks.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now the Senator has tempted me to do what I said I would not do.

It is my firm conviction, I may say to the Senator from Maryland, after the most careful study I have been able to make of this whole question, that if the Federal Government in establishing this Federal system should adopt the amendment of the Senator from Missouri it would be inviting and encouraging competition with its own plan which ultimately would undermine and destroy it.

I do not think the amendment which the Senator from Missouri accepted, as tendered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH], is any protection at all to employees. It reads:

Provided, That no employer shall make election to come under or remain under the plan a condition precedent or a requirement of continued employment.

Mr. President, that sounds well; but how are individual employees all over the United States to be protected from being subjected to economic coercion, either direct or indirect, which their employers may exert upon them? It is perfectly silly, it seems to me, for any person to contend that a mere affirmative declaration in this amendment will be any protection whatsoever to employees from coercion upon the part of the employer.

In that connection I may say that I am authorized to make the declaration on the floor of the Senate that the American Federation of Labor regards the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri with great apprehension. The A. F. of L. is convinced that it will do more to engender the type of company unionism which the Wagner labor-disputes bill—passed by the Senate some days ago—was designed to prevent than any other single thing which can be done.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator mind pointing out wherein my amendment will tend to promote company unionism? It is very easy to make such a statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is based upon the theory, as I understand, that private pension plans which enable the employer to have the right to say whether an employee is to be a beneficiary under one type of plan or the other produces a condition in which the employee feels unable to assert his economic rights. Labor also feels, and I think rightly so, that the employer controls the private annuity plan, and is likely to use it to keep organized labor out of his plant.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will take the trouble to read the amendment he will find that suggestion expressed in the negative in the amendment as I introduced it, and specifically covered in the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not agree with the Senator that the affirmative statements contained in this amendment are any protection whatsoever to millions of employees scattered all over the United States. This body recognized the problem when it went on record overwhelmingly in favor of setting up specific machinery in an attempt to protect labor in its right to organize and to bargain collectively. We have just completed a tragic experience in regard to section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, where there was an affirmative legislative declaration which proved hardly worth the paper on which it was written.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I did not think we went so very far to set up specific provisions to protect labor. The Senator is one of those who voted to let the value of labor be set by a more or less arbitrary order, which down in my section of the country amounted to $19 for a month's work. I do not see why we ought to kick on a thing like this.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I debated that question, Mr. President, with the Senator when the work-relief measure was under consideration. I stated then, and I now repeat, that the Senator was opposed to the measure, and that I refused to follow his leadership in that regard when he sought to defeat the measure, rather than to secure its enactment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a suggestion?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will bear in mind that my time is running out.

Mr. CLARK. I simply desire to suggest to the Senator, when he says that none of these propositions can be valid or controlling, that the control of the subject and the enforcement of the subject are vested in the very same board on whom the validity of the whole act depends, and who are to administer every provision of this measure which the Senator thinks to be of such great merit.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; but the Senator desires to increase their responsibilities several million fold by the amendment which he is proposing.

I admit that the administrative responsibilities under this bill, as it was reported, are great, and I was coming to that very point in a moment. That is another reason why I think the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri would be a very grave mistake from the point of view of those who are in sympathy with the objectives of this proposed legislation.

Mr. President, under the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, employees are to have the right to elect whether they shall come under the Federal plan or whether they shall stay under the private plan. Furthermore, employees will be able to elect, later, whether they desire to change from the private plan to the Federal plan; or, if an employer decides to abandon his system, then all of his employees will be transferred over into the Federal plan. There will be involved in transfers of this kind, in hundreds of thousands if not millions of instances, separate calculations, which will have to be made, and there will have to be audits of the books of the various corporations having private annuity plans with relation to every individual employee to determine whether the proper taxes have been paid for the employees included in the Federal system.

If there could be anything better calculated to destroy the effectiveness of the Social Security Board and to burden it with a task beyond human execution, I fail to see how it could be devised. At least it goes beyond the powers of my imagination to conceive of any task which could be imposed upon this board which would more quickly break down its efficiency and its administration.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course it must be conceded that it would be to the advantage of the employer to have as many as possible of his employees younger men.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator's point is well taken, and I agree with him entirely.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not see how there can be any question about that, because the older men get as an annuity more than they put in. We recognize that the employer still has some economic influence over his workers. Suppose a worker were employed at the age of 55, and should elect to go into the private system, and the employer would rather not have him in that system, but would rather have him in the Government system: It is conceivable that there might be some economic influence used to induce the employee to accept the Government plan rather than the other.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that such influence will be exercised. Furthermore, I may point out, as the Senator well knows, that an inducement is already afforded to the older employees to elect to come under the Government plan, as they will get a larger percentage of the employer's contribution if they do so. Under the amendment, inducements would be offered to both the employer and the employee to load down the Government plan with the older employees and to upset its actuarial basis, and, as I said at the outset, ultimately to destroy the whole plan.

There is one other point in connection with the increased administrative problems which will be presented to the board if the amendment of the Senator from Missouri shall be adopted: A worker who has been in the employ of his employer under a private plan for a number of years either elects to go under the Federal plan or he loses his job with that employer and goes to another. Think of the many calculations which will have to be made after an audit of the books to find out just what that man's wages were during all the time he was in the first employer's employ; and if he shall have gone to another employer, additional calculations will have to be made in that instance.

I think the administrative calculations that will have to be made if this amendment shall become law will run into astronomical figures and will entail an administrative force which will make any other agency of the Government, in relation to the number of its employees, shrink into insignificance.

Mr. President, I desire to say that, so far as I know, the Committee on Finance heard every person who desired to be heard upon this question. The hearings are here. They embrace 1,354 printed pages. There are only two instances where any of the witnesses who appeared before the committee urged the proposition which is now being favored by the Senator from Missouri. One was Mr. Folsom——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Wisconsin on the amendment has expired.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will speak on the bill. One was Mr. Folsom, of the Eastman Kodak Co., who came, I submit, primarily to argue in favor of the plant-reserve type of unemployment insurance, but who, it is true, incidentally pleaded for the exemption of private pension plans. The other was a Mr. Forster, of Philadelphia, a very estimable gentleman whom I have known casually for several years, but who, let it be said, is in the business of selling this kind of insurance.

If the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri shall become a law it will provide a bonanza for the brokers who are engaged in selling this type of insurance, because they will have all the employers of the United States as prospects, since all employers can derive financial profit through establishing private annuity plans covering their younger employees, leaving the Federal system to take care of the older employees. Wherever they can devise a plan which appears to be of less expense to the employer than the public plan, there will be a sale prospect for the insurance broker. The insurance brokers will be reaping commissions and let it be said, they will be getting commissions and will be getting pay for selling something in this country which everybody would otherwise be compelled to buy.

It is my understanding that most of the large employers in the United States, who have the kind of plans which have been referred to in the debate as being good plans, have already made studies of the bill as it was reported from the Senate Committee on Finance and have come to the conclusion that it is better for them to revise their plan, to bring their employees under the Federal title, and to supplement the Federal plan with their private plan to take care of certain groups of their employees, especially those in the higher-income class.

I recognize the right and the obligation of any Senator who regards this proposed legislation as unsound, from the point of view of public policy, to oppose it and to vote against it on the final roll call; but to those Senators who believe that the objectives sought by this title of the bill are sound, I appeal not to take this oblique method of destroying this part of the bill. I absolve any Senator from any intent to do that and especially the Senator from Missouri. I know that he and the other Senators who have been supporting the amendment are doing so in the best of faith, but I appeal to the Senators who have not considered the amendment carefully and who believe in the principles of the bill not to vote for the amendment and thus to preserve the integrity of the bill.

I reserve the balance of my time on the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it had been my purpose to discuss somewhat in detail various provisions of the pending measure and to examine a number of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which, in my opinion, condemned as unconstitutional titles II and VIII. However, the time for general debate has passed and under the unanimous-consent agreement there is but limited opportunity for discussion.

Mr. President, with the general purposes of the bill I am in accord and sincerely desire that some measure within the authority of the Federal Government might be enacted that would tend to accomplish the results desired. I am anxious to see ample provisions made for old-age benefits and for unemployment insurance. I cannot help but believe that this measure will prove disappointing and will not attain the objects desired. That several of its provisions will be held invalid I am constrained to believe.

I shall briefly consider titles II and VII because it is the view of many, as well as my own, that they exceed the power of Congress to enact into law.

These titles do not provide for appropriations to the States as do the other titles, which provide for child welfare, old-age assistance, unemployment compensation, public health, and maternal care. They seek to set up a Federal system of providing for compulsory old-age annuities. This is apparent from the face of the bill, which is entitled "An act to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits", and so forth. Title II is designated Federal old-age benefits, and title VIII taxes with respect to employment. It is clear from a reading of the bill, as well as the reports, that the taxes imposed by title VIII are to be levied for the purpose of paying for the Federal old-age benefits provided for under title II. It must be conceded that the Federal Government, being a government of delegated powers, cannot directly set up a system of compulsory old-age annuities. This is evident from such decisions as United States v. Knight (156 U. S. 1), holding that the power of a State to protect the life, health, and property of its citizens is a power not surrendered to the Federal Government and is essentially exclusive to the State. This principle was recently reaffirmed by the Supreme Court in the Railroad Retirement Act decision, the effect of which the Chief Justice said in his dissenting opinion was to deny to Congress "the power to pass any compulsory pension act for railroad employees." If we cannot pass a compulsory pension act for railroad employees engaged in interstate commerce, how can we pass a pension act for employees engaged in intrastate, as well as interstate, commerce? Yet this is what we are trying to do.

Congress, in titles II and VIII, knowing that it cannot directly collect premiums to pay compulsory old-age annuities, is attempting to reach this result indirectly through the taxing power. It is obviously disclosed on the face of the act what is trying to be done. The premiums are collected as taxes under title VIII and the annuities paid as Federal old-age benefits under title II. I do not believe anyone ought seriously to contend that Congress by changing the form of the bill can overcome the constitutional limitations. As stated by the Supreme Court in Linder v. United States (268 U. S. 5)—

> Congress cannot under the pretext of executing delegated power pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the Federal Government. And we accept as an established doctrine that any provision granted by the Constitution not naturally and reasonably adapted to the effective exercise of such power but solely reserved to the States is invalid and cannot be enforced.

This is not the first time we have attempted to exercise a power which belongs to the States or the people. Congress at one time passed an act prohibiting transportation in interstate commerce of goods made at a factory in which 30 days prior to removal of the goods children under certain ages had been permitted to work. This was, of course, an attempt to regulate child labor under the constitutional power to regulate commerce among the several States. The Supreme Court held this act unconstitutional, stating that the grant of power to Congress over the subject of interstate commerce was to enable it to regulate such commerce and not to give it authority to control the States in the exercise of their police power over local trade and manufacturing (Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S. 251). Having failed in this attempt, Congress next tried to regulate child labor under the taxing power. The Supreme Court also held the taxing act unconstitutional, stating in the Child Labor Tax case (259 U. S. 20) that the decision in the Hammer v. Dagenhart case was controlling and reaffirming its position that Congress could not "under the pretext of exercising its powers pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the Government."

I might also cite numerous other cases bearing out this same principle, such as Hill v. Wallace (259 U. S. 44) and Trusler v. Crooks (269 U. S. 475), holding that Congress cannot under the taxing power regulate boards of exchange.

Yet in this bill we are trying to do that which the Supreme Court has repeatedly held we are without power to do.

It has been stated on the floor that the Railroad Retirement Act decision does not affect this bill, due to the fact that that act related to the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce and not to the power of Congress to levy taxes. But this is an old argument. This argument was also advanced in the Child Labor Tax case after the Supreme Court had already held that Congress had no power to regulate child labor under the commerce clause. The Supreme Court stated that Congress, likewise, had no power to regulate child labor under the taxing clause. Do we wish to go around the circle again now that the Supreme Court has held in the Railroad Retirement Act decision that Congress is without power under the commerce clause to provide compulsory pensions to railroad employees? In view of this decision, and in view of the Child Labor Tax case, how can it be said that Congress can provide pension plans for employees under the taxing clause? Have we not already learned a lesson from cases already decided?

I listened with interest to the argument advanced by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] in support of this part of the bill. He relies to a large extent on the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Veazie Bank case (8 Wall. 553) upholding a 10-percent tax on bank notes issued by State banks, the McCray case (195 U. S. 27, 59) upholding a discriminating tax upon the sale of oleomargarine, the Doremus case (249 U. S. 89) sustaining the constitutionality of the Harrison Narcotics Act, and the case of Magnano v. Hamilton (292 U. S. 40) upholding a State tax of 15 cents a pound on butter substitutes. But the sole objection to these taxes was their excessive character. Nobody contended that Congress did not have the power to lay a tax upon bank notes issued by State banks, or to lay a tax upon oleomargarine. Nothing except the taxes appeared upon the face of the acts. This was pointed out by the Supreme Court in the Child Labor Tax case and was also emphasized in the Doremus case, in which a regulation subjecting the sale and distribution of narcotic drugs to official supervision and inspection was upheld as a necessary means to enforce the special tax imposed upon such drugs. But here the face of the bill itself shows that the tax under title VIII has been adopted as a mere disguise to permit the Federal Government to set up a system of compulsory old-age annuities, which it has no power to do under the Federal Constitution.

Let us glance at these two titles to see whether or not they disclose on their face their real purpose.

(1) The employees subject to tax under section 801 of title VIII of the bill are the only persons who receive benefits under title II of the bill.

(2) The employees whose wages are exempt from the tax under section 801 of title VIII of the bill do not receive any benefits under title II of the bill.

(3) The tax on employees is computed on a percentage of the wages received by the employee after December 31, 1926, with respect to employment after such date. The old-age benefits under title II are computed upon wages received by the employee after December 31, 1936, with respect to employment after December 31, 1936.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Utah on the amendment has expired.

Mr. KING. I will speak a few minutes, then, on the bill.

Mr. President, continuing,

(4) Services performed by an individual after he has attained the age of 65 are not counted in arriving at the benefits payable under title II but are subject to tax under title VIII. The purpose of this provision is to discourage individuals from working after they attain the age of 65. However, some of the people who will be 65 at the time this bill is enacted will be forced to pay taxes on their wages, although they cannot obtain any benefits at all under title II. Manifestly it is claimed that this is done to mislead the court into believing that title II has no direct connection with title VIII. But I do not believe the court will be misled by such subterfuge, and it is certainly a rank discrimination against aged people to tax their meager earnings after they become 65 and at the same time deny them any benefits under title II.

(5) In the case of a person who dies before attaining the age of 65, his estate receives under title II 3½ percent of the total wages determined by the Social Security Board to have been paid to him with respect to employment after December 31, 1936. These are the same wages upon which he is subject to tax under title VIII. There seems to be no justification for paying to the estate of such person subject to tax under title VIII a certain portion of his wages regardless of his financial needs, unless it is admitted that such payment is a return of the taxes paid under title VIII.

(7) An individual who is not qualified for benefits under section 202 of title II of the bill will receive payments under title II equal to 3½ percent of the wages paid with respect to employment after December 31, 1936, and before he reached the age of 65. These wages are the same as those with respect to which such person is subject to tax under title VIII. This means that an employee who has received wages subject to tax under title VIII before he attained the age of 65 of less than $2,000, or an employee who did not receive wages in each of at least five different calendar years after December 31, 1936, and before he attains the age of 65, will get back 3½ percent of such wages regardless of his financial needs. This can only be justified on the theory that he is being returned the taxes he paid under title VIII.

It is true that the tax under title VIII is paid into the general fund of the Treasury. But this was also the case in respect of the child-labor tax imposed by title XII of the Revenue Act of 1918 and the tax on grain futures imposed by the act of August 24, 1921 (42 Stat. 187). The Supreme Court did not hesitate to hold both of these taxes unconstitutional. (Child Labor Tax case, 259 U. S. 20; Hill v. Wallace, 259 U. S. 44.)

But suppose the two titles are held to be separate. How can title II standing alone be upheld, for how can it be said that Congress is providing for the general welfare by paying bounties to wealthy salaried individuals, or their estates at death, and at the same time deny such payments to agricultural laborers, persons employed by religious or educational institutions, and domestic servants? Moreover, under title VIII, when standing alone, there is a discrimination in its classification apparently in violation of the fifth amendment. Why should stenographers, clerks, janitors, and so forth, doing the same class of work, be exempted from a tax when they are working for religious, charitable, scientific, or educational institutions and subject to the tax when working for other institutions or business?

If one looks at the face of the bill, the conclusion seems inescapable that the tax under title VIII is not a tax at all, but an attempt by Congress to assert a power reserved to the States and the people under the tenth amendment. The decision cited by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] dealing with State workmen's compensation acts do not appear to be decisive of this question, for these acts deal with the powers reserved to the States or the people and not to the powers delegated to the Federal Government under the Constitution. I do not see how we can expect the Supreme Court to be "misled" by the subterfuges we have adopted in this bill in the attempt to exercise a power over which Congress has no control under the Constitution. I cannot help but believe that under the decisions of the Supreme Court titles II and VII will be declared unconstitutional.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am convinced that it will be impossible for us to reach a vote on the pending amendment tonight. There are, however, some other amendments which I think we can dispose of which will not take much time. I have talked to a number of Senators, and I hope the unanimous-consent agreement which I send to the desk may be entered into.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That when the Senate concludes its business today it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow; that at not later than 1 o'clock p. m. tomorrow the Senate proceed to vote without further debate upon the pending amendments; and that thereafter no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill or any amendment or motion relating thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to permit the Senator from Connecticut to ask a question?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, just a moment. Reserving the right to object, and making the same reservation for the Senator from Connecticut, I desire to have it understood, as accompanying this proposal, that there shall be an agreement that no action shall be taken with respect to the Holt case tomorrow, because I understand that at 12 o'clock the majority and minority members of the committee will file reports. I desire to have them printed and lie over at least for the day.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I may say that in the event the Senator-elect from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT] should present himself, the program of the Privileges and Elections Committee would be to present such a report as the committee may finally submit, and ask for the printing of the report, and that the matter lie over at least for 1 day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia desire the attention of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. GEORGE. I merely stated that if the Senator-elect from West Virginia should present himself tomorrow, the purpose and program of the Privileges and Elections Committee would be to ask that the report submitted be printed and that the matter lie over for at least 1 day, so that it would not interfere with the legislative program.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Oregon that I have conferred with the colleague of the Senator-elect from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]; and he states—I think we shall get through with this measure by 2 o'clock, anyway, under this arrangement—that he does not feel that there would be any objection, and that the Senator-elect would not present himself until after this matter should have been disposed of. I am confirmed in that by what the Senator says.

Mr. LONG. We can take up the Holt case at sometime tomorrow, however, can we not?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; if we get to it.

Mr. McNARY. No, Mr. President; I understood from the response to the statement I made that that would not be done I intended to imply that I thought it was fair and orderly for the reports from the committee to be filed at 12 o'clock, and that they should go over for at least 1 day. I think that statement was confirmed by the Senator from Georgia, who thought likewise.

Mr. GEORGE. I should ask that the matter take that direction, Mr. President. If the Senator-elect should present himself tomorrow, the reports of the committee would be in order; and I should certainly request that the matter lie over for 1 day, in order that the reports might be printed and made available to the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. That is correct. Then I suggest, after conferring with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], that it would be well to provide that 15 minutes should be allowed on the bill and 10 minutes on the amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. Then, with that modification, I ask that the proposed agreement be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the modified unanimous-consent proposal.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That when the Senate concludes its business today it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow; that at not later than 1 o'clock p. m. tomorrow the Senate proceed to vote without further debate upon the pending amendments, and that thereafter no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 15 minutes upon the bill, or more than once nor longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment or motion relating thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senator from Mississippi. Does the proposed agreement say "pending amendment" or "pending amendments"?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Connecticut is interested in one of the committee amendments and desires to make a motion with reference to that matter, as I understand. Under this agreement he will have 25 minutes after 1 o'clock to speak on that question.

Mr. LONERGAN. That is satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement as modified? The Chair hears none, and the agreement as modified is entered into.

SOCIAL SECURITY AGAINST FEDERAL POLITICS

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I apprehend that few Members of the Senate are opposed in principle and in fact to the general purposes of this bill as advertised, namely, unemployment insurance, old-age and childhood relief, and sundry measures of social relief.

The striking and outstanding features of the bill, as analyzed by those who have studied it, are:

First. The small and even trifling amount of relief it will afford in the coming fiscal year 1936 to meet urgent conditions of unemployment and social helplessness, as compared with the vast program of promises to be fulfilled in the years 1939 to 1949, when the planned chaos of this so-called "emergency", we hope, will be over.

Second. Compare the estimate of only $400,000,000 which will be realized under the bill for unemployment insurance and old-age relief in 1936 with the $5,000,000,000 appropriated subject to the allocation of the Executive for his emergency in 1936.

In other words, for the 1936 emergency of the Executive, we have appropriated 12 times the amount available in 1936 for unemployment insurance and old-age relief combined.

Thus, under the cloak of "social security" for the unemployed, old age, and childhood relief, we give the Executive $5,000,000,000 for 1936, or an equivalent of $125 per voter for all of the 40,000,000 votes cast in the Presidential election.

Social security is needed now, in the hour of adversity, not in 1939 or 1949, after the "emergency" is presumed to be past.

In a published analysis of the practical effects of the bill I note that beginning January next a tax of 1 percent on pay rolls will begin to finance unemployment insurance, which will amount to $200,000,000, and that the Nation and the States will increase this to $400,000,000—available a year later, when the Government reports the collections.

In 1937 this pay-roll tax will jump to 2 percent for unemployment insurance, and another 2 percent to finance old-age benefits. Thereafter, we are told, these tax rates will steadily mount until by 1949 they are estimated to reach $4,000,000,000—a fifth less than the amount which for 1936 we toss to the Executive for his campaign fund in one lump sum subject to his allocation as he mysteriously chooses.

If we are here as practical statesmen, and not rubber stamps for a Presidential campaign committee, the questions that confront us are these:

First. This emergency which we aim to meet is in the fiscal year 1936 instead of 1949. Then why make available for unemployment insurance and old-age relief only $400,000,000 for 1936 against $4,000,000,000 in 1949?

Second. If we are for social security and not for Federal dominion over the States, then why in this day of emergency do we make only $400,000,000 available to unemployment insurance in 1936, against $5,000,000,000 available as an Executive political club in 1936?

The situation stands that for every dollar available for social security in 1936, we give $12 to the Executive to club the States, yes, even the Congress, into compliance with the dictates of the White House candidate for reelection.

Is that social security, or is it Federal politics?

Does that make for even the political security of the States from Federal domination?

In order to make this plan of social security effective now, when it is bitterly needed, instead of in the remote future, after the emergency is, as we hope, past forever, not to return, I suggest, Mr. President, that the amount of $2,000,000,000 be drawn from the $5,000,000,000 1936 campaign fund hitherto appropriated subject to the allocation of the Executive.

This suggestion will accomplish two principal objects:

First. It will demonstrate that the purpose of Congress is to achieve true social security, and not merely to issue a wide-spread campaign of idle promises, hullabaloo, and hypocrisy. It will start to give that security now, when it is bitterly needed, instead of passing the buck to future administrations and imposing a vast tax burden on both wage earners and employers alike, increasing steadily until 1949.

Second. It will materially aid the cause of the Republic, the protection of the rights of the States, the protection of Congress itself from the Federal encroachment now usurping the legislative powers of Government, if the Executive club of $5,000,000,000 is shortened to $3,000,000,000, and the difference appropriated to the social security of the needy and the political security of the Republic.

THE REPUDIATION PARTY AND ITS EMBLEM, THE BLUE EAGLE

Mr. President, those administration pallbearers who are trying by the passage of this bill to resurrect the dead corpse of the N. R. A., after the nine Justices of the Supreme Court by unanimous decision have consigned it to the grave, place themselves in a unique position.

They brand themselves as the outstanding repudiators of political history.

First. By retaining the provision which suspends the antitrust laws, they repudiate the platform on which they and the President were elected, namely, their "100 percent" pledge demanding—

Strict and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws to prevent monopoly.

Second. They repudiate two of the outstanding progressive achievements of the former Democratic administration of Woodrow Wilson, namely, the Clayton Antitrust Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act.

Third. They repudiate every Democratic platform in 40 years, from the second administration of Grover Cleveland in 1892 to the one and only administration of Franklin "Delaware" Roosevelt, demanding strict enforcement of antitrust laws against monopoly.

Fourth. They repudiate the Constitution which they swore to uphold when they took their oaths to obtain seats in this Chamber, after the Supreme Court has found that the N. R. A. is unconstitutional.

Fifth. They repudiate the sovereignty of their own States, which this unconstitutional N. R. A. seeks to override.

Sixth. They repudiate the demands of 90 percent of the people of the United States, who overwhelmingly call for the burial of the Blue Eagle and all its progeny as the greatest stench that has ever revolted the American body politic.

Seventh. They repudiate even their own speeches for national industrial recovery, because the N. R. A. has been the chief obstacle to industrial recovery, as witness:

(a) In the first year after the first N. R. A. code, in July 1933, the industrial production of the United States fell 25 percent, while the industrial production of Canada and Great Britain rose 20 percent.

(b) It brought on the greatest industrial strike in American history, 800,000 wage earners being involved in a country-wide strike, and both leaders of the warring industrial factions were factotums of the N. R. A., namely, the Chairman of the N. R. A. Textile Code Authority was spokesman for the employers, while a leading member of the N. R. A. Labor Advisory Board was president of the United Textile Workers, both being official members of the N. R. A. set-up, and the entire strike or industrial war sprang from the N. R. A. and was apparently designed within N. R. A. circles to cut down the surplus supply of textile mill goods and boost consumer prices.

(c) Even in April 1935 the American Federation of Labor finds 11,500,000 unemployed as compared with 7,000,000 reported by the American Federation of Labor for April 1932, showing an increase of 4,500,000, or 65 percent, in 3 years of increasing industrial chaos, during which leading industrial countries abroad, such as Great Britain and Canada, have returned to a normal condition of industrial prosperity, the greatest they have known since the World War.

Eighth. Though the Supreme Court, by declaring the N. R. A. and its huge patronage of 5,400 unlawful under the Constitution, the administration majority repudiates its 100-percent pledge in the Chicago platform to cut off useless bureaus and reduce the cost of Government "by not less than 25 percent."

Ninth. Though the Supreme Court has performed a great public benefaction in cutting down Government costs by several hundred millions in its decision that kills the N. R. A., the administration majority deliberately chooses to ignore the Court's decision and thereby repudiates the Chicago platform pledge for a "Federal Budget annually balanced."

Tenth. Though the greatest bar to national industrial recovery is the uncertainty and fear injected into the economic development of the country by unconstitutional "experiments" and the "crack-down" threats to all private enterprise, the administration majority persists in perpetuating this N. R. A. uncertainty nearly a year longer and thereby repudiates its pledge to "recover economic liberty", to "restore confidence", and to "bring peace, prosperity, and happiness to our people."

Thus the administration supporters of the dead N. R. A.—upholders of the corpse which "nine out of nine" Justices of the Supreme Court have pronounced legally defunct and stinking—have not only defied the judgment of the Court and the provisions of the Constitution, but they have repudiated every economic plank of the platform on which they were elected, repudiated every pretense of recovery on which they based their long chain of "planned emergency", repudiated the record of all previous Democratic administrations in 50 years, repudiated the speeches and White House promises of 3 years of industrial chaos, repudiated even the false hullabaloo of the 11,000 press releases sent out by the publicity division of the N. R. A. and its short official life to date.

In short, we have here the greatest case of partisan self-repudiation known to history. Having repudiated their own party, all their platforms, all their party history, all their former leaders, and finally repudiated themselves and their own works and words—deserted all for one stinking corpse—these "new dealers" of the N. R. A. today have resolved themselves into a new party in American history—the repudiation party.

The other day a mass convention of American citizens gathered at Springfield, Ill., the former home of Abraham Lincoln, who prayed at Gettysburg that "government of the people, by the people, and for the people should not perish from the earth."

Were it not for the vicious principle, the rotten failure, the industrial chaos, exemplified by the unconstitutional N. R. A. Act and its exposure by the nine out of nine Justices of the Supreme Court, that convention might not have been held. This "grass roots" convention of the Mississippi Valley States marked the popular revulsion of the American people against this corpse of the N. R. A. Other like conventions are to be held in Ohio, representing nine central industrial States of the East, another at Salt Lake City representing the Mountain States, and still another representing the Pacific Coast States. Similar revolt against Federal domination of industry is expressed by the Governors of nine States of the South.

Here is one of the cheering patriotic signs at this "grass roots" convention in the town made famous by Abraham Lincoln. That assembly of 8,000 cheered the name of Alfred E. Smith, the Democratic standard-bearer of 1928. They cheered the names of the Senators of Virginia, the veteran CARTER GLASS and former Governor BYRD. They cheered the name of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. And why these cheers from a convention presumed to be of the party of Abraham Lincoln?

The reason is plain enough. They had read the speeches and watched the votes and listened to the radio messages of these statesmen, who placed country above the party whip, Jefferson and Lincoln above Tugwell and Richberg, the nine Justices of the Supreme Court above Frankfurter and Cohen, and Washington, Cleveland, Theodore Roosevelt, and Woodrow Wilson above Franklin Roosevelt, General Johnson, and the Blue Eagle corpse and chaos.

That mass convention of the "grass roots" States had taken notes of the attitude of this administration toward the Supreme Court and toward the Constitution, as expressed by the President in his White House press interviews. Those men and women of the Middle West were not blind to the White House slur, that the nine Justices of the Supreme Court had set the country back 50 years, to the "horse and buggy" days because they had set up the Constitution as their guide, instead of the Roosevelt-Johnson codes; because they had set the principles of American liberty above the edicts of a would-be dictator; because they had placed the sovereign rights of the States above the interests of code monopolies; because they had held, as every court before them held for 146 years, that the legislative power of Congress cannot be delegated and usurped by the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to build here a bureaucratic autocracy as in Rome, Berlin, and Moscow.

That is why this "grass roots" convention cheered, not only the names of Jefferson and Lincoln, but the names of Alfred E. Smith and the Senators from Maryland and Virginia. It is only the scared handful, repudiators of their own party and platform, afraid to voice their own true convictions because of that club of the $5,000,000,000 burglary, the officeholders waiting for their split of the greatest hold-up of history, who are unable to read the handwriting on the White House wall—"Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin"—weighed and found wanting!

On the day chosen for dragging this Blue Eagle corpse through the Senate Chamber under a gag law, insisted upon by the President himself, the Shriners of the United States were marching up Pennsylvania Avenue 100,000 strong. The Stars and Stripes waved everywhere, at the reviewing stands and above the marching ranks, and there was not a Blue Eagle sign displayed.

And thereon hung the great news event of the day. When Franklin "Delaware" Roosevelt saluted the Shriner colors as the procession passed his reviewing stand, he was compelled to salute The Star-Spangled Banner—the flag of the free, the flag of the Constitution—instead of the corpse shrould of the Blue Eagle, the bedraggled rag of the N. R. A., salvaged by the swag of $5,000,000,000.

Mr. President, I ask leave to print an industrial-control report relating to the "grass roots" convention.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Industrial Control Reports, issued weekly by the James True Associates, National Press Building, Washington. No. 102. June 15, 1935]

FRANKNESS FROM THE "GRASS ROOTS"

Washington opposers of the administration, both Democrats and Republicans, are greatly encouraged over two results of the "grass roots" convention—establishment of the constitutional issue, and the brushing aside of restraint in attacking Roosevelt personally.

Undoubtedly, the most effective feature of administration propaganda was its protection to Roosevelt until the recent Supreme Court decision. More than 300 official administration press agents were assisted by thousands of socialist "fronts" and "plants" in every section of the country. Reds on the staffs of papers used their influence to the utmost. Jewish advertisers also brought pressure to bear.

About 60 days ago, a prominent Washington correspondent of an opposition paper told the writer that it was not safe to attack Roosevelt. Published criticism brought a flood of protests from the "fronts" and "plants", and their letters were received as an indication of public opinion until their names became familiar to editors. Hoaxing of the press in this way is an established method of Communists and Socialists.

We have received many letters of protest and denunciation, a number of them threatening, because of our many factual statements regarding Roosevelt. A striking similarity of phrasing unmistakably indicates the organized effort on the part of reds and pinks to protect "the first Communist President of the United States", as he is called in Russia, against adverse criticism.

More than a year ago we predicted that the new deal would be blocked when the public learned some of the facts regarding the motive behind it. Now the bars are down. A large part of the public suspicions that it has been betrayed. Roosevelt's responsibility for his appointments and leadership is established. Without serious molestation, newspapers can now publish the truth, thanks to the "grass roots" convention.

"GRASS ROOTS" HIGHLIGHTS

From a well-known observer at the convention, we learn there were 8,666 delegates registered from 10 States. The galleries at all meetings were filled. As many women as men attended. A great many resolutions were thrown out, none but the most important and significant were considered. "The new deal was indicted, tried, found guilty, and sentenced to hang."

Women will wield more influence in the next campaign than ever before, if convention indications hold. Women delegates were unanimous in their denunciation of the First Lady for her political activities and radio advertising. They pronounced her a socialist and severely criticized other members of the family. It was evident that Republican women will make Mrs. Roosevelt one of the major issues, and that they are determined that the next hostess of the White House shall be one who will carry out the American tradition.

DAMNING EVIDENCE AND A FEW QUESTIONS

Breaking of the popularity of Roosevelt is largely due to a public realization of the hypocrisy and double-dealing of the man. If you want just a mild hint of his complete change of front, write the Republican National Committee, Washington, D. C., for a complimentary copy of the pamphlet "Franklin D. Roosevelt, as Governor, Warned Against * * *."

Why did Roosevelt junk the Democratic platform he was elected on and substitute the Socialist platform? Why did he adopt the "brain trust" new-deal program after he had vigorously denounced control by master minds, infringement of State rights, Federal interference with business, and the other communistic ventures he has promoted as President?

Answers to these questions have been supplied the public by millions of letters, books, pamphlets, small periodicals, booklets. Many thousands of these pieces have been stolen from the mails by "new dealers" in the Postal Service. To a large extent, pamphleteers have expressed their goods. The campaigns have been mightily effective and have largely nullified the press censorship and the effects of threatened press boycotts.

CREDIT WHERE CREDIT IS DUE

For the vast and recent change in public sentiment, credit should be given to Albert W. and Elizabeth Dilling, Gerald B. Winrod, H. A. Jung, Col. Edwin M. Hadley, Robert E. Edmondson, Col. E. N. Sanctuary, John B. Trevor, John B. Snow, Miss M. R. Glenn, and many others. At great personal sacrifice, these Americans have exposed the communistic fallacies of the administration and the sinister international influence behind Roosevelt.

DEMOCRATS WITH THE NEW-DEAL JITTERS

Fear of what the new deal will do to the party is expressed by prominent Democrats in two major ways. The movement to block the nomination of Roosevelt is well started, and is based on the fact that he has proved he is not a Democrat. The plan is to have one-third of the delegates instructed or pledged not to vote for Roosevelt, and the movement is said to be making marked headway in Georgia, Tennessee, Virginia, Florida, and Texas.

This week, a secret poll of Democrats in the House was made by the National Congressional Committee to determine sentiment for the 1936 election. The first question is: "What in your opinion is the reaction, personally, to Mr. Roosevelt in your district?" The second deals with the reaction to administration policies, and the third is: "Can Roosevelt carry your district?" It is the earliest poll ever conducted by the committee.

OLD WINE IN A NEW BOTTLE

The United States Flag Association is promoting a declaration of independence of today, to be signed by 56 "outstanding Americans." The announcement will be made on July 4, and the new document will paraphrase the original declaration.

Insiders say that since both Roosevelt and his wife are officials of the United States Flag Association, they cannot understand how a conclusion was reached without removing both the blue and the white from the flag.

DEFYING THE SUPREME COURT?

Apparently in opposition to the principles laid down by the Supreme Court in the recent N. R. A. case, new-deal leaders in Congress are making desperate efforts to push through the A. A. A. amendments. Although new-deal legal tricksters say they have gotten around the decision by "rephrasing" parts of the bill, the legislation, if enacted, will give the Secretary of Agriculture supreme control of farm products. Leaders in both Houses and A. A. A. officials have admitted, insiders say, that the announcement regarding cancelation of licensing power was merely a "gesture." There is no doubt that the proposed legislation is unconstitutional.

The N. R. A. bill, considered under gag rule by the House, holds together the Tammany political machine in a form that can be rapidly extended for the political campaign. It offers practically no benefits to industry and preserves the sinister menace of political control. Even in its emasculated form it is doubtful that all provisions of the N. R. A. bill are constitutional.

TAX FIGHTS

We predict that the next heavy blow dealt the new deal will be in the form of suits to recover processing taxes. While egomania still rules at the top, sane administration officials admit that the entire A. A. A. structure is in grave danger. It has been announced that the tobacco industry will claim about $50,000,000. Thursday, in Philadelphia, six packing companies filed suits in the United States district court.

They have asked that the collector of internal revenue be enjoined from collecting further processing taxes. The suits are based on the claim that the Government has no power to control production, that the processing tax is not a tax as defined by the Constitution, and that the Secretary of Agriculture should not be granted arbitrary taxing power. Other suits for millions of dollars have been filed in various sections of the country.

WORTH-WHILE BROADCASTS

Monday evening, June 17, at 6:30 (eastern standard time), Representative HAMILTON FISH, Jr., will broadcast a vitally important statement on the condition of agricultural exports and imports. His speech will be made over the blue network of the National Broadcasting Co.

On June 21, at 10:30 (eastern standard time), Representative MARTIN DIES, of Texas, will broadcast over the same network an appeal to reason regarding aliens. He will advocate the immediate passage of his bill to permanently stop immigration and deport 3,500,000 aliens unlawfully in this country. His speech is sponsored by more than 100 patriotic organizations.

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Recently Representative FISH introduced the last McNary-Haugen bill (H. R. 8427), providing for the control and disposition of surplus farm commodities. He will explain his reasons during his broadcast next Monday, and following we state some of the facts that impelled him to attempt to save vanishing markets for the country's agricultural products.

The present condition vitally affects every American business. Mr. FISH takes the charitable view that the demoralization is due to mistakes of administration officials. About 16 months ago we emphasized certain facts which strongly indicated a deliberate attempt to retard recovery. Since then we have repeatedly charged the administration with planning to impoverish the country in order to make its communistic experiments acceptable. The following facts are submitted as proof of our charges:

EVIDENCE OF OFFICIAL SABOTAGE

Half or more of our cotton exports have been lost. We are actually importing more wheat than we are exporting. Since last July 21,760,000 bushels of wheat have been imported, while exports were only 3,008,697, and the equivalent of 11,702,000 in flour, a large part of it milled from Canadian grain. We have imported 11,269,000 bushels of corn, 14,084,000 bushels of oats, 9,624,000 bushels of barley, and 12,474,000 bushels of rye.

During the first 4 months of this year importation of grains amounted to $22,721,000, and during the same period of 1934 the total was $4,785,000. Wheat exports dropped from 12,174,000 to only 57,000 bushels. Rice imports increased from 12,708,000 to 39,024,000 pounds. Rice exports decreased from 39,375,000 to 28,778,000 pounds. There was a net trade loss of 36,912,000 pounds of rice during the 4-month period.

Butter imports increased from 217,000 pounds last year to 17,398,000 pounds for the first 4 months of this year. Importation of meats increased from 16,326,000 pounds to 38,041,000 pounds, while meat exports decreased from 79,544,000 to 57,888,000 pounds. Lard exports dropped from 166,952,000 pounds to 51,386,000 pounds during the 4-month period. Tobacco exports for April this year were the smallest for any month since March 1918.

In 1925 exports of agricultural products reached a total of about one billion and a half dollars. In 1934 exports were $733,416,000—less than half. Authorities estimate that agricultural exports for this year will not exceed $500,000,000. The 1925 figures are based on a sound, 100-percent dollar. The decreased figures are in the depreciated 59-cent dollar. Based on the old sound dollar, the value of this year's farm exports will not exceed $300,000,000—one-fifth of agricultural exports for 1925.

These figures are but a small part of a large number which point to the same inevitable conclusion. The new deal planned ruin of the country's agriculture is almost complete, and during the process the administration stealthily increased its communistic control. The only success of the administration is its deliberately planned demoralization.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there is to be no other discussion of the pending amendment this afternoon, I understand.

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator from Mississippi desire to have me present at this time the amendment in behalf of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], or shall I wait until tomorrow?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator may offer the amendment now. I should like to clear up as many of these matters as possible.

Mr. McNARY. In the absence of the Senator from South Dakota, who is compelled to be away on account of official business, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] presents an amendment on behalf of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], which the clerk will state.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 80, after line 4, it is proposed to insert the following:

TITLE XII—INDIAN PENSIONS

SEC. 1201. That heads of families and single persons of Indian blood, not otherwise entitled to the benefits of this act, who have heretofore attained or shall hereafter attain the age of 65 years, are hereby declared to be entitled to a pension from the United States in the sum of $30 per month, subject to the following conditions:

Applications for pension by persons of Indian blood shall be made in writing in such form as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe and shall be filed by the applicant with the superintendent or other officer in charge of the agency or tribe to which the applicant belongs. Upon receipt of any such application the Secretary of the Interior shall make, or cause to be made, such investigation as he may deem necessary to determine the accuracy of the facts shown thereon, including the annual income of the applicant from other sources. In all cases where the Secretary of the Interior finds that the annual income of such applicant is less than $1 per day, said Secretary shall award to such applicant a pension in an amount which, when added to the other annual income of such applicant, will bring such annual income up to but not in excess of $1 per day: Provided, however, That payments to Indian pensioners entitled hereunder shall be made in equal monthly installments from the date of approval of application therefor by the Secretary of the Interior, and, in the discretion of said Secretary, such payments may be made direct to the individual beneficiaries or to other persons designated by the Secretary of the Interior providing care for any beneficiary under the provisions of this act: Provided further, That in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior such payments due any Indian beneficiary may be handled in accordance with regulations governing individual Indian money accounts; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to prescribe such further rules and regulations as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this section.

SEC. 1202. All persons of Indian blood who are permanently blind but less than 65 years of age shall be entitled to a pension from the United States in the sum of $10 per month, and all persons of Indian blood who have for 1 year previous to the enactment of this act been unable to perform physical labor on account of being crippled or otherwise disabled shall be entitled to a pension from the United States in the sum of $10 per month during such disability.

SEC. 1203. The Indians and Eskimos of Alaska shall receive a pension under same conditions and in an amount one-half that provided for Indians under this title.

SEC. 1204. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, so much as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, including necessary expenses of administration.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have considered the amendment very carefully, and I am willing that it shall go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am in possession of a letter written to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], in charge of the bill, by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] desired to have me offer for the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed following the action on the amendment.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUNE 17, 1935.

Hon. PAT HARRISON,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR HARRISON: I have talked with your secretary, Mr. Calhoun, about the proposed amendment to the Securities Act providing for pensions for aged Indians.

I am in sympathy with this proposal, and I call attention to its modest character. These aged Indians will receive from the Government a sufficient monthly pension to bring their total income to a dollar a day. The possibilities of abuse under the terms of the proposed amendment would be minimized. Most of these aged Indians, insofar as they receive incomes at all, receive them from properties under the jurisdiction of the Government and in the form of payments out of individual accounts held in trust. This fact means that the Interior Department, through its local superintendencies, would know with considerable exactness the income already being received by each of these old people.

I should add that a large percentage of them are now receiving little income or none at all. Many of these old Indians possess no land any more. Others are in possession of allotments not yet alienated, from which the regular income is trifling. Often their landholdings are split through numerous heirship processes—lands which have become subdivided through the pernicious allotment system to that point where they can no longer be profitably rented or farmed. These old Indians now subsist at a near-starvation level through such help as relatives may be able to give them and through the very inadequate relief grants now made to the Indian Office.

I should add that these old Indians are the best of their race, and I believe every American feels that the Government ought not to let them starve nor leave them dependent upon uncertain local charity. Usually they do not have access to the relief sources which imperfectly meet the need of aged white people.

What probable liability will the amendment place upon the Government? There are about 14,000 Indians aged 60 years and over; about 11,900 aged 65 years and over; about 9,325 aged 70 years and over. The maximum theoretical liability for the group 60 years and over would be $4,260,000 a year. I would estimate roughly that two-thirds of the total of those 65 years and over (11,900) would be entitled to some aid, and that on the average this two-thirds (7,900) would become entitled to pension at the rate of 66⅔ cents a day. This would mean an annual cost to the Government of about $1,925,000. You will understand that this is a merest estimate and that in time of drought and of business depression the required amount might be larger, while in good times it would be substantially smaller.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN COLLIER, Commissioner.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I offer two clarifying amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi offers amendments, which the clerk will state.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 29, line 1, after the word "State", it is proposed to insert the words "and its political subdivisions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 33, line 23, after the word "State", it is proposed to insert the words "and its political subdivisions."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I offer another amendment, to be inserted at three places in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendments.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 8, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the words "Secretary of the Treasury" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "Social Security Board."

The amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 8, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "Secretary of the Treasury" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "Social Security Board."

The amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 9, line 10, it is proposed to strike out the words "Secretary of the Treasury" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "Social Security Board."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RADCLIFFE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, line 22, after the word "literary", it is proposed to strike out "or educational" and to insert in lieu thereof "educational or hospital."

On page 52, line 4, after the word "literary", it is proposed to strike out "or educational" and to insert in lieu thereof "educational or hospital."

On page 61, line 22, after the word "literary", it is proposed to strike out the words "or educational" and in lieu thereof to insert "educational or hospital."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have examined this amendment. Many charitable hospitals have been held by the Treasury Department to be exempt, and this provision of the bill is in the same wording as the present law.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, what is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. There are certain charitable hospitals which under the wording of the bill are already exempt.

Mr. CLARK. According to the great argument the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] made this afternoon, as well as the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], this amendment would impair the constitutionality of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sorry the Senator places that interpretation on it. The wording is as follows:

(b) The term "employment" means any service, of whatever nature, performed within the United States, or as an officer or member of the crew of a vessel documented under the laws of the United States, by an employee for his employer, except—

* * * * * * *

(6) Service performed in the employ of a corporation, community chest, fund, or foundation, organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational purposes—

And so forth.

Mr. CLARK. Unfortunately, perhaps, the Treasury Department does not as yet make the laws of the United States. The Supreme Court within the last 2 or 3 weeks said that the Congress still functions. While I have no objection to this amendment, which simply provides another exemption to those already in the bill, it certainly gives the lie to the argument which has been made here all afternoon by the sponsors of the bill, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and others, that to put exemptions in the bill would invalidate the measure. I shall not object.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word. The amendment does not, in my opinion, add anything to what is already in the bill. It is a clarifying amendment, and for that reason it was offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think I shall take this opportunity to say a few words on one section of the bill, particularly that which applies to old-age pensions.

For many years I have been very much interested in the philosophy of legislation of this character. In reviewing a few days ago some of the bills, I found that on August 15, 1919, I introduced a bill which provided a pension for those who had reached the period of old age.

Today we are considering a plan directly affecting millions of our citizens—so many, in fact, that they outnumber the combined populations of Arizona, Delaware, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Utah, Vermont, Wyoming, the District of Columbia, and Alaska.

The problem which we are called upon to face in the care of our dependent aged grows more acute with each year. Within a century man's expectancy of life has jumped from 39 to 60 years, so that in 1930 those over 65 years of age represented more than 5 percent of the entire population, a percentage double that of 1850.

We cannot lightly approach any plan touching so large a number of our citizens. For good or ill, dependent wholly upon the ultimate soundness of our program, our decision will affect the entire economic, social, and perhaps political life of the country. The cry for old-age pensions, delayed though it has been in the United States, is now challenging the attention of the country as never before.

Wrapped in our own affairs, we have gone our separate and indifferent ways until conditions have become so acute as to compel a wide-spread realization of an indefensible situation. Now an awakened and aroused public opinion clamors against this existing evil, and few are left sufficiently entrenched in selfish interests to remain calloused to the call of humanity, or to dare ignore the challenge of an enlightened remedy.

There are some who attribute this to clever and appealing propaganda; but the demand for decent care for our dependent aged is rooted in the fundamentals and ideals of our democracy, and of late years has been intensified by our rapid mechanization and industrialization.

A century ago problems of old age from the economic standpoint were not so acute nor so sharply defined as today. The man of 50, 60, or 70, growing more adept at his trade, handled his simple tools skillfully; and if advancing years laid a restraining hand on his shoulders, they also bestowed the benediction of experience, trustworthiness, and dependability which youth does not always possess. So the elderly man had his place. The whir of the accelerated motor, the machine which, serving man, demands perfection of eye and muscle of him who serves it—these did not yet constitute a challenge to his efficiency. On the farm, in the simple workshops, in the fields, driving the vehicles of those days on rude but safe highways, the worker of yesterday did not find it necessary to clutch with a life-and-death grasp the job which gave him independence.

The women also had their place. The mother found many things to which her willing hands could turn in the homes of yesterday, with the younger generation coming on apace and no labor-saving devices to lighten the burden. Families were larger in those days. There were more children to share the expense of maintaining the older generation when it ceased to be financially independent.

Again, in the last decade we have turned sharply from agriculture to industry. Forty-five years ago nine and one-half million of our people were engaged in agriculture, topping by more than a million those found in mining, manufacturing, transportation, and trades. But in 1920, 30 years later, agriculture claimed only 11,000,000 as against 21,000,000 in the other fields of endeavor, and in 1930 there was an actual decrease in the number of agriculturists, as against 25,000,000 in the industrial groups. In other words, in 1890 a greater proportion of our people were engaged in agriculture than in any other business activity. Since that time, and up to 1930, agriculture has barely held its own, whereas the industrial group has practically trebled itself.

This, of course, has a direct bearing on old-age dependency. Not only did the elderly man and woman find a niche in the agricultural pursuits, but the struggle for shelter and food was not so exacting on the farm as in the crowded cities to which industry has drawn our people. Every time man's inventive genius constructs another labor-saving device, more men and women walk the streets with empty hands, and the blight falls first on those of matured years.

But to damn the machine is futile, since progress is inevitable, and should be welcome. Nevertheless, it is essential that we adjust our economic life to our new industrialization and mechanical advancement; and when we care for the aged we have taken one necessary step in that direction.

Not alone have we become industrialized as a nation, but we boast an industrialization pitched to the highest degree of efficiency, specialization, and speed. Added to this there is the abominable practice, rapidly increasing, of placing an employment deadline somewhere between 35 and 50. In 1929 the National Association of Manufacturers, after a survey, revealed that 30 percent of the concerns investigated—the large corporations chiefly—operated under set age limits, the most accepted limit for unskilled workers being 45 years of age; for skilled workers, 50 years of age.

Now, if it were possible, in this land of abundant natural wealth, for the majority of our workers to earn enough to accumulate a surplus for their latter years, this condition might not be so tragic. But, of course, in the case of at least half of those employed this is utterly impossible. The Brookings Institution, in its survey based on conditions in 1929, found that about 40 percent of income recipients received incomes less than $1,000. The average income was approximately $1,200. Going by slowly ascending steps to an annual income of $2,000, we find that less than 19 percent of our people receive in excess of this amount. These figures were calculated, not on conditions in one of our depression years, but in our so-called "boom" year of 1929, when we as a people were supposed to be cradled in luxury and abundance. When we consider the exigencies of life, the inevitable periods of unemployment and illness, the losses and the costs involved in these and in other accidents and hazards, we are putting it optimistically if we assume that even 40 percent of our people are able to accumulate a substantial and adequate savings account. As a matter of record, 16,000,000 families, comprising about 59 percent of all our families in the United States, in 1929 had aggregate savings of about $250,000,000 only. This amounts to about $16 per family.

Of this group some will have a few hundreds more, some nothing at all, and many will be in debt, but the net answer is the same. More than half of our people cannnot, out of their meager earnings, set aside any substantial amount against the years of unemployment and old age.

We find, then, in our modern industrialized society these two related causes of old-age dependency, neither of which surely can be charged to those who suffer from them most: Foremost, low wages which prevent accumulation of any degree of wealth, and its close associate, the refusal to employ those who have passed youth and middle age. Various industrial studies made within the last 10 years plainly indicate that only a few of our workers have earned enough to maintain a moderately high standard of living, and not only have earnings fallen short of this in good times, but during periods of depression they have been insufficient to supply even the minimum necessities. It is conceded by most students of the problem, including the foremost authorities in this field, that the major factor for poverty in old age is the low wage scale. I may say that an examination of this class shows that small earnings and dependency in old age maintain an inseparable relationship.

A year ago a study by the Brookings Institute entitled "America's Capacity to Consume" startled us by its statistics concerning the number of families and workers who, because of the small return for their labor, were compelled to exist far below our accepted American standard.

A series of charts on family and individual incomes is followed by this explanatory language:

The figures in the table and chart reveal in a striking way the wide disparity in incomes, and also the concentration of the great bulk of the families in a relatively narrow income range. The greatest concentration of families was between the $1,000 and $1,500 level, the most frequent income being about $1,300. The following summary statement will aid in showing both the range and the concentration that exists:

Nearly 6 million families, or more than 21 percent of the total, had income less than $1,000. About 12 million families, or more than 42 percent, had income less than $1,500. Nearly 20 million families, or 71 percent, had income less than $2,500. Only a little over 2 million families, or 8 percent, had income in excess of $5,000. About 600,000 families, or 2.3 percent, had income in excess of $10,000.

In the face of this cold statement of facts, no argument is needed to establish our responsibility toward those who find themselves at 60 or over without adequate savings. If anything is needed to strengthen this recognition, let us turn again to the study of our wealth distribution for an analysis of surveys during the same period:

Sixteen and two-tenths million families with income from zero to $2,000 (59 percent) show aggregate savings of about $250,000,000. 8.9 million families (32 percent) with income from $2,000 to $5,000 saved approximately 3.8 billion dollars. Two million families (7 percent) with income from $5,000 to $20,000 contributed about 4.5 billion dollars of the aggregate savings. 219,000 families with income above $20,000 saved over $8,000,000,000.

About 2.3 percent of all families—those with incomes in excess of $10,000—contributed two-thirds of the entire savings of all families. At the bottom of the scale 59 percent of the families contributed only about 1.6 percent of the total savings. Approximately 60,000 families at the top of the income scale, with income of more than $50,000 per year, saved almost as much as the $25,000,000 families (91 percent of the total) having income from zero to $5,000.

Thus, it must be evident to the most determined individualist that in most instances old-age dependency in the United States is not due to individual maladjustment, but to social and economic forces which the individual cannot hope to govern.

To present a problem is much simpler than to present its solution. Yet I am confident that once the magnitude of this problem is clearly recognized, once we face squarely the fact that it has passed beyond the ability of the individual to master, and is distinctly national in its character, we shall set ourselves to the task of its solution. It does not square with our sense of fair play and honorable acceptance of responsibilities to flinch and turn a cowardly back upon our duty.

In Wisconsin, where there was an opportunity for voters to register their convictions, they voted in 1931 to change the law from optional to mandatory form; and Minnesota followed suit in 1933. Six of the 13 laws enacted between 1931 and 1933 set the pensionable age at 65 years instead of 70. Since the beginning of 1935 seven States have enacted laws affecting old-age pensions. In every instance the trend has been toward liberalization such as reduction in age limit, lowering the residence requirements, or making the obligation of the counties mandatory.

I do not claim that an old-age pension alone will bring to this country a full solution of its pressing problems; but it is an important, righteous forward step.

Both the farmer and the business man should profit by the application of a generous pension plan, greatly in excess of whatever share of the financial expense may fall upon them. If it is feasible to spend billions of dollars to lift industry from its prone position and start it again into its stride, it is feasible to expend money in this just cause with the expectation that it will carry out the second part of its twofold purpose, namely, to stimulate the purchase of our so-called "surplus commodities" by assuring for them a fixed and balanced market.

No less a beloved citizen than Abraham Lincoln has said:

> Inasmuch as most good things are produced by labor, it follows that all such things ought to belong to those whose labor has produced them. But it has happened in all ages of the world that some have labored, and others, without labor, have enjoyed a large proportion of the fruits. This is wrong and should not continue. To secure to each laborer the whole product of his labor as nearly as possible is a worthy object of any good government.

Those who are devoting themselves to the cause of good government can take this means of assuring to our workers, in their old age at least, the products of their labor of earlier years. Thus, there shall be happiness and peace in homes now darkened with despair, and in serving the cause of good government we shall serve the cause of democracy and humanity as well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. VAN NUYS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of John B. Tansil, of Montana, to be United States attorney, district of Montana, to succeed James H. Baldwin, appointed United States district judge for the district of Montana.

Mr. BURKE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of John E. Sloan, of Pennsylvania, to be United States marshal, western district of Pennsylvania, vice J. Hilary Keenan, resigned.

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on Commerce, reported favorably the nomination of John Monroe Johnson, of South Carolina, to be Assistant Secretary of Commerce, vice Ewing Y. Mitchell.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nomination of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar. If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK BOARD

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John H. Fahey, of Massachusetts, to be a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, on yesterday I agreed with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] that this nomination should be disposed of today. The junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MOORE] desires to be present when it is considered. He had an engagement to deliver a commencement address in New Jersey this afternoon and went there by airplane to deliver the address. I understand he will be back tomorrow. In view of the circumstances, I ask that the nomination be passed over for another day.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Georgia to say that the nomination will be taken up tomorrow?

Mr. RUSSELL. I should be perfectly willing to dispose of it today; but, as I said, the Senator from New Jersey made the request of me that I mention his desire to be present when the matter is considered. I said that it was not in my hands, but that I should have to see the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is not on the floor at the present time.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Florida spoke to me about the matter. I shall be very glad to accommodate the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MOORE], as well as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and let the nomination go over until tomorrow. I hope it may be disposed of tomorrow.

JOHN MONROE JOHNSON

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from New York if he reported the nomination of Mr. Johnson?

Mr. COPELAND. I did.

Mr. McNARY. The nomination has gone to the calendar?

Mr. COPELAND. It has gone to the calendar.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Elwood Hamilton to be United States district judge, western district of Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Harry E. Pratt to be district judge, division no. 4, district of Alaska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, with the exception of Alice L. Woolman, appointed to be postmaster at Coweta, Okla., I ask that all the other nominations on the calendar be confirmed en bloc, and that that nomination be permitted to remain on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, with the exception mentioned, the postmasters will be confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. I notice that the nominations of postmasters in Massachusetts are not on today's list. Has the committee been unable to report them as yet?

Mr. McKELLAR. The committee has reported them, and they will be on the calendar tomorrow.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in pursuance of the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 19, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate June 18 (legislative day of May 13), 1935

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

Elwood Hamilton to be United States district judge, western district of Kentucky.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JUNE 18, 1935

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our fathers' God and our God, we pray for Thy wisdom to strengthen us for every duty; and not unto us but unto Thy holy name we give glory. We entreat Thee that the Man of Galilee and the multitudes may come face to face. Come, Thou Almighty One, to the city life of our country. Here breaks life's blushing dawn; here, too, burns life's sultry noon; and here are the aged, with no light at evening time. O come to them with their eager rivalries, broken ambitions, petty jealousies, hard-visaged toil, and with their hard-hearted mammonism. O come to their abodes of sweat, labor, and blood. Master of life, come to their two twilights of childhood and old age and stay their tears. Move us with divine compassion, which is love touched with pity. May all hands be joined with all remedial forces—religious, social, and political—to save, succor, and bless the forgotten crowds. In the name of our Elder Brother. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 1121. An act for the relief of Isidor Greenspan; and

S. 1863. An act for the relief of Trifune Korac.

OUR VANISHING WORLD MARKETS

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the radio address of Hon. HAMILTON FISH, Jr., of New York, over the National Broadcasting Co. network, June 17, 1935:

Secretary of State Cordell Hull, with whom I served for many years in Congress, is both a scholar and a charming gentleman from Tennessee, but he has nursed an obsession for a quarter of a century, and nothing is more dangerous to the interests of American wage earners and the public than an obsession that has been suppressed for so long a time. Mr. Hull is at heart an internationalist and a free trader, one of the relics of that school of thought long since discarded by the Democratic Party, except in certain sections of the South. Suddenly clothed with power over negotiating trade agreements through the abject and cowardly surrender of a supine and partisan Congress, at the arrogant demands of the President and, in my opinion, unquestionably in defiance of the Constitution, Mr. Hull, as Secretary of State, finally finds himself an actual dictator in shaping tariff policies. After waiting all these years, burdened with a single obsession or mission, the very thought of breaking down economic barriers in a protective and nationalistic world warms the cockles of his heart.

What difference does it make if our textile mills are shut down by competition with Japanese labor, or our single biggest export market, the Philippines, from whom we buy 85 percent of their products, is surrendered for the benefit of Japanese labor paid 20 cents a day in order to put Mr. Hull's long-distance economic policies into effect? American labor has not as yet realized what it means to have a free trader as Secretary of State, but they all will when the unconditional favored-nation clause goes into effect, bringing American labor into competition with the poorly paid labor of Europe and Asia.

The refusal of the State Department to approve the offer of the Philippine Congress to protect the American textile trade is so against the interests of the United States that, in my opinion, it is actually treasonable.

The adherence to the unconditional most-favored-nation clause means the lowering of the duties to all countries, which in turn means the lowering of the American standard of wages and living and the loss of our foreign markets, as our wage earners are not willing to compete with the cheap labor of Europe and Asia.

The theory behind the Hull program is that if American industry cannot compete with foreign industry, why, it is just too bad, even if additional scores of thousands are added to the army of unemployed. The treaty with Belgium will undermine the glass, cement, and lace industries, that with Sweden our match industry, and that with Cuba seriously affects our domestic vegetable market and our beet-sugar industry. The handwriting on the wall is perfectly clear, and the next logical and consistent step to be taken, in accord with the Hull economic program, will be the destruction of the beet-sugar industry in a dozen western States, because it cannot survive without adequate protective duties.

Mr. Hull only a few days ago, speaking in New York, opposed the plan to buy at home which is certainly consistent with his free-trade views. The Secretary of State went on to say that from July 1934 to February 1935 the volume of imports of dairy products, vegetables, meats, and fruits were far below the 10-year average. I propose to answer this statement with facts and figures, so that he who runs may read and understand just what Mr. Hull, Mr. Wallace, and Mr. Tugwell have done to the American export trade in agricultural products.

Up to the present time only four reciprocal trade agreements have been consummated—those with Cuba, Haiti, Belgium, and Sweden. It is interesting, from an agricultural point of view, to note the increase in Cuban export trade in vegetables to the United States from November 1934 to April 1935, as compared with the corresponding season the year previous, before the trade agreement had gone into effect: Shipments of tomatoes from Cuba to the United States increased to 50,841,909 pounds, compared with 33,950,000 pounds; eggplant increased from 3,676,536 pounds to 5,309,695 pounds; peppers, from 1,838,958 pounds to 4,643,023 pounds; cucumbers, from 1,441,563 pounds to 1,871,161 pounds; and potatoes, from 102,359 pounds to 2,289,412 pounds. Exports of potatoes from Cuba to the American market in April amounted to 1,651,775 pounds, compared with none in April 1934.

What will the farmers of Florida, who grow large quantities of tomatoes, cucumbers, and peppers, do about these increased importations of vegetables when they learn the facts? And what will the reaction be in Maine, Michigan, and Idaho to the phenomenal increase in the importation of potatoes from Cuba as a result of the Hull-Wallace-Tugwell tariff experiment? It was officially stated by the "new dealers" that the trade agreement with Cuba would open up a new market for Maine potatoes; but, like most of the new-deal experiments, this theory or propaganda has failed to materialize and instead is actually causing serious competition for American potato growers in our home market.

My criticism of Mr. Hull's tariff theories, as visionary, impractical, and ineffective, should not be construed as a partisan attack, as it is substantiated by Mr. George N. Peek, until recently the President's foreign-trade adviser and head of the administration's Export-Import Bank, who denounced the Hull program of unconditional most-favored-nation trade agreements as basically unsound and ruinous to the Nation's foreign and domestic markets. I hope Mr. Peek will go further and likewise expose and denounce the host of young "brain trusters", impractical visionaries, and free-trade crystal gazers who have been appointed in the State Department by Secretary Hull. How do they ever expect to put unemployed Americans back to work when they are deliberately pursuing a policy to destroy both our foreign and domestic markets?

I introduced last week, with the permission of Senator McNARY, of Oregon, a copy of the last McNary-Haugen agricultural surplus control bill, providing for the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce. The bill as introduced in the House is known as H. R. 8427.

My object in introducing this bill is to try to save the rapidly vanishing world markets for our agricultural exports. The loss of these foreign markets for American cotton, wheat, meat products, and other agricultural and dairy commodities during the last 2 years is a sad commentary on the new deal, which has all but wiped out the export of American farm products.

The tragedy of the situation is that we are actually importing more wheat than we export, have lost over half of our cotton export trade, and have been for the past year importing shiploads of corn, oats, barley, and rye. Since last July we have imported 11,269,522 bushels of corn, 14,084,415 bushels of oats, 9,624,076 bushels of barley, and 12,474,248 bushels of rye.

In addition, 21,760,366 bushels of wheat have been imported, whereas we have exported only 3,008,697 bushels and the equivalent of 11,701,723 bushels of flour, a large part of that milled from Canadian grain, leaving the United States, unbelievable as it may sound, a net importer of wheat with the duty at 42 cents.

According to Government figures on our foreign trade, for the first 4 months of this year (1935), as compared to the same period in 1934, the decrease in exports and the corresponding increase in imports is more startling. During this period the importation of grains and grain preparations for the first 4 months of 1935 amounted to $22,721,000 as compared with $4,785,000 imported in 1934. Wheat exports dropped from 12,174,000 to 657,000 bushels, and rice exports from 39,375,071 pounds to 28,778,537, while rice imports increased from 12,708,270 pounds to 39,024,220 pounds, a net trade loss of 36,912,484 pounds during the 4-month period. Butter imports increased from 217,000 pounds last year to 17,398,000 pounds for the first 4 months of this year; meat products showed an increased importation from 16,326,000 pounds to 38,041,000 pounds, while our exports of meat products dropped from 79,544,000 to 57,888,000 pounds. Cattle imports during this period increased from 39,667 head, valued at $459,880, in 1934, to 147,874 head, valued at $3,704,872, in 1935. Lard exports decreased from 166,952,000 pounds during the first 4 months of 1934 to 51,386,000 pounds in 1935. With respect to tobacco exports, the quantity recorded for April 1935 was the smallest for any month since March 1918.

The total exports of agricultural products in 1925 was approximately one billion and a half dollars, whereas, in 1934, the total exports amounted to less than half, or $733,416,000, and it is estimated that in 1935 it will not exceed $500,000,000. This startling decrease is based on a depreciated 59-cent dollar, whereas the 1925 figures are on a sound-money value, or a hundred-cent dollar. In other words, the foreign importers should have been able to buy 41 percent more from the United States than before we depreciated the dollar, consequently the real export value based on a gold dollar will probably not exceed $300,000,000, or one-fifth of our export trade for 1925 in agricultural products. That is what the new-deal A. A. A. program and the reciprocal-trade agreements have done toward destroying the markets of the world for our farm export surplus.

Only immediate action can preserve our foreign markets for our surplus agricultural products and the enactment of a bill similar to the McNary-Haugen bill, which passed the Congress and was vetoed on May 3, 1928, would offer a practical solution to the ruinous loss of our foreign markets for our farm products. The conditions that prevailed when President Coolidge vetoed the bill are completely reversed, and today we face constantly diminishing world markets approaching a vanishing point.

One of the main pledges of the new-deal administration was to promote the export of our agricultural products, but, instead, because of the half-baked program of the A. A. A., the destruction of crops and the birth control of pigs, it has demoralized and all but destroyed the export of wheat, cotton, pork, and other farm produce which has been a great source of wealth to our people for over a century and a powerful factor in the development and prosperity of our country. The facts are seeping through to the people in spite of the radio barrage of the "new dealers" and the honeyed words and sugar-coated phrases of the President in his fireside chats, that the impractical, visionary, and magical schemes of the Wallaces, Tugwells, and Ezekiels to destroy crops and provide a program of scarcity when there are more than 11,000,000 unemployed and over 20,000,000 Americans on relief, have increased unemployment, retarded recovery, and lost our world markets for our exportable farm surpluses formerly constituting the bulk of our foreign trade.

If the cotton farmers and the South want to commit economic suicide for temporary profit, that is their business, but it does not change the facts by one jot or tittle. Lenin was right when he said that the capitalists would commit suicide for temporary profit, and that applies to the farmers as well. The cotton farmers have already lost over 50 percent of the world markets and will lose the balance to Brazil, Egypt, India, and Soviet Russia within the next 2 years, bringing economic and financial ruin to the South.

An Associated Press report from San Pedro, Calif., dated June 8, reads as follows: "60,000 tons of Argentina corn are en route to the United States, it was disclosed today with the arrival of the British tramp freighter Cycle from Rosario with 4,000 tons for local discharge and 2,500 tons for other Pacific coast ports. Other steamers are en route with similar cargoes. Higher prices for domestic corn have made importations of Argentina grain profitable. The grain is being sold to Pacific coast millers." The duty on corn is 25 cents a bushel, but it is now profitable for foreign producers to pay the 25-cent tariff on corn and enter the American market in competition with the farmers of the United States.

Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace goes about the country denouncing the tariff and blaming our protective tariff for the loss of the world markets for our agricultural products. What kind of reasoning is this? If it were not for the 42-cent duty per bushel on wheat, 25 cents a bushel on corn, and other protective duties on practically all farm products, the United States would be the dumping ground of the Argentine, Australia, Canada, and Europe. If these duties were reduced or wiped out our American market would be swamped with Canadian wheat, Argentine corn, dairy products from Denmark and Australia, and vegetables, poultry, and cattle from the adjoining nations of Canada, Cuba, and Mexico, where the wage scale is much lower than our own. Are there any farmers in the North or South, East or West who would willingly give up or surrender any of the protection that has been secured under Republican administrations to preserve the home market for American agricultural products?

I do not claim to be a dirt farmer, although for 16 years I have represented in Congress a great dairy, vegetable, and poultry district along both banks of the Hudson River, and in the New York State Legislature for 3 years prior to the World War. I am a member of the local, Pomona, and the National Grange and of the Farm Bureau Federation, but I do not claim to be able to solve the farm problems with which the western farmers are confronted. They know their own problems better than anyone else. They are entitled, certainly, to the cost of production plus a reasonable profit and to have a parity or equilibrium between the price of farm products with other industries whether in the factories or in the mines.

I have reintroduced the McNary-Haugen bill, as I sincerely believe, in view of the changed conditions since the Coolidge administration and a rapidly disappearing world market for our farm surplus, that immediate constructive legislation is necessary to hold the markets we have and regain those that we have lost for the benefit of American farmers and producers.

Only prejudiced "new dealers", incapable of facing the facts, will attempt to deny any of the above statements regarding the tragic loss of our foreign markets for our agricultural products. As for me, I will continue to present the facts and figures, alarming and stubborn though they be, so that every American with sound common sense will know the truth, and let the chips fall where they may. I plead guilty of being a critic of the wanton and willful destruction of our export trade for our farm surpluses; and if this be treason let the "new dealers" make the most of it. The truth is mighty and will prevail.

The time has come for the American people to arise and unite for the preservation of the great American market which in normal times consumes over 90 percent of our total production. Under the Roosevelt-Hull-Wallace-Tugwell policy we are rapidly losing both our domestic and foreign markets, particularly for agricultural products, and increasing the number of our unemployed, who are, in effect, the forgotten men of the new-deal administration.

THE 1935 EDITION OF NUISANCE AND SALES TAXES

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the tax bill, which was passed yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I want it plainly understood that my remarks are not a criticism, in any sense, of the distinguished Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. DOUGHTON, of North Carolina. If such criticism might be imputed, I need only to refer to the courageous stand of the gentleman from North Carolina against the proposed sales tax in the Seventy-second Congress. Nor is criticism intended for the members of the Ways and Means Committee. They are naturally obligated to carry out the administration program. I am aware of the prevailing sentiment among Members of the House to reach an early adjournment. My contention is, however, that if this wrong is ever to be righted by a tax on wealth, incomes, inheritances, and gifts the start must be made now.

We are asked to reenact the same schedule of nuisance and sales taxes that has been in existence for the past 2 years. We are asked to reenact this legislation without due consideration, without debate, and without an opportunity to change the bill or to offer amendments. In other words, we are asked to again become mere rubber stamps, and to rubber stamp for 2 years more the most vicious, iniquitous, unfair, and unjust set of nuisance and sales taxes ever inflicted on a hard-working, long-suffering, tolerant, and ever-patient citizenry by a Congress who ought to know better, who does know better but refuses to act in the best interests of these taxpayers. I expect to vote against this bill. I shall vote that way because I am unalterably opposed, fundamentally and inherently opposed, to all sales and nuisance taxes which in the final analysis are successful attempts to saddle on the backs of the poor those tax burdens which by their very nature and by right and by justice should be borne by the rich.

When the present schedule was enacted in 1932 during the Hoover administration it was done because Congress was told that these taxes were only emergency taxes; that they were designed and created to balance the Budget which was out of balance because of the depression and panic that was then beginning to manifest its worst phases in hard times, bankruptcies, receiverships, and poorhouses for 90 percent of our citizens. We were told at that time that this measure would be only a temporary one. We were told that it would not or could not last for long. The people were asked to resign themselves to the cruel fate of the depression and to dig down deep into their pockets and instead of having less taxes to pay they would be forced to pay more taxes because of these obnoxious nuisance and sales taxes.

In other words, if a man was racked and tortured by lumbago, rheumatism, or arthritis, instead of giving him something to ease the pain, instead of giving him a sedative, give him a more and bigger dose of that same old lumbago, sciatic rheumatism, and arthritis. If the former light dose did not kill him then this new and heavier dose certainly would. And so the taxpayers struggled along in the hope that Congress would do as it had promised in 1932 and repeal these taxes at the end of the expected 2 years.

Now we are informed, seemingly with great glee, that because of the imposition of these nuisance and sales taxes, the receipts of the United States Government for 10 months of the fiscal year closing on May 31, 1935, were $612,186,571 more than was received for the corresponding 10 months of the previous fiscal year. We are advised that the total receipts of the Federal Government amounted to $3,336,733,841 in the first 10 months of that year. Because of those increased receipts heretofore mentioned, we are told in the same breath that for the first time in years the Budget is balanced—that is, providing you do not count the $6,470,205,136 which represents the total expenditures of the Government for the 10 months of the fiscal year mentioned, namely, 1935. To go on further, those total receipts exceeded the regular expenditures of the Government by nearly $100,000,000 for the first 10 months of that fiscal year; but we must "bear in mind" that the emergency expenditure, so called, which represents the amount of money to keep 22,000,000 on relief rolls and which provides for food to eat, clothing to wear, and a house in which to dwell, that for those human, necessary needs for the same period, $3,229,000,000 was spent.

So we are told also, or at least by inference we deduce, that our expenditures for the next few years are expected to exceed the revenue collected by more than $3,000,000,000 per year. In other words, our outgo for the next few years is to exceed the income more than $3,000,000,000 per year. So, to balance our Budget further in the direction of "regular" expenditures, we propose to reenact these sales and nuisance taxes, which are insufficient to meet in the slightest measure the expenditures needed to carry on for 22,000,000 out of work, out of jobs, out of income, and out of property and wealth. We propose to send out a boy to do a man's job.

Where we should be imposing heavy taxes on all swollen fortunes of $100,000,000 and over, where we should be scaling all swollen fortunes of $100,000,000, $200,000,000, $300,000,000, and a billion dollars down to $1,000,000, we propose a reenactment of these wholly inadequate nuisance and sales taxes that have been in effect for 4 years. Sale taxes and nuisance taxes that haunt the farmers, the wageworkers, the small businessman, and the soldiers of the country, night and day, 24 hours per day, 7 days per week, 4 weeks per month, and 12 months per year. And so we are advised that this emergency still exists, an emergency that licenses the United States Government to tax every article, every commodity in sight, merely scratch the surface of the depression and at all times shy away from the millionaire, from the man of riches, from the man of wealth, from the man of big income, and from the man with the biggest fortune. Let us leave him alone, let us stay away from him, let us not heap burdens upon his broad and sturdy shoulders. Let him keep what he has, let him have more wealth, more riches, more swollen fortunes, and let him strictly alone. That is the doctrine, that is the philosophy taught in this bill.

Here we are after 4 years of taxation outrages and injustices. We are asked to come in here today, suspend the rules, with 20 minutes' debate on each side, with no opportunity to speak and deplore the further perpetuation of this iniquity, no chance to deplore to the masses of taxpayers what is being done, what is being reenacted under a gag rule and with no time for consideration, deliberation, or debate.

Mr. Speaker, I propose not only to protest against this sort of procedure, I propose to vote against the bill. My justification in that vote will be found first that the Government of the United States has no business to engage in petty larceny. It has no business to stoop to the level that is now being perpetuated by reaching out the hand of Government tax collectors, plunging it deep into the taxpayer's pockets and filching and extracting therefrom a tax on the food he eats, the clothing he wears, the automobile that he rides in, the house in which he lives, and every article and commodity that he is compelled to use daily, weekly, monthly, and yearly by this imposition.

Twenty-six States have already adopted sales taxes and those sales taxes are in most cases in operation. In opposition to these State and Federal sales and nuisance taxes and to all such taxes, I lay down five elemental rules.

First. Our Constitution, our best traditions, and our greatest historians continually preach the equality of men in the United States of America. We are taught and we believe that all men are created free and equal. Assuming those premises to be correct, then we say that every man, every woman, and every child has a right to live and to live decently and respectably.

Second. Every man, every woman, and every child has a right to eat decent, wholesome, satisfying foods.

Third. Every man, every woman, and every child has his inherent right to attire himself in decent, comfortable, satisfying raiment and clothing.

Fourth. When the day's toil is ended and completed this same American citizen has a right to indulge in decent, wholesome recreation, amusement, and entertainment.

Fifth and finally. This same citizen, when he has lived and served his three score and ten years, or even before, has for his inherent right, the right to end his days in peace and comfort without being hounded from the cradle to the grave by noxious, foul sales and nuisance taxes.

I contend that it is the privilege of American citizens to purchase the commodities of life, including food and clothing; to attend the motion-picture performances, the theater, the circus, to ride in their automobiles, be they Fords or Cadillacs, to reside in their homes, be they hovel or palace, without being raided by Uncle Sam and the State governments every time they buy a commodity, be it a toothpick or radio.

Simply because this law was enacted under Hoover and the Republicans does not justify its perpetuation by Roosevelt and the Democrats. I, too, want to balance the Budget. I know that the Budget can never be balanced in this manner. I know that the only way the Budget can be balanced is by taxing wealth, by imposing heavy levies upon inheritances and gifts, and on all large incomes. By that method England is balancing her Budget. By that method we can balance our Budget.

As you know, I have voted against all "gag" rules. Of all of them this one is of the worst. The bill we are considering has a privileged status. It is considered without a rule from the Committee on Rules. It gives us no chance to reduce 3-cent postage to 2 cents, a wanton, cruel raid upon the pocketbooks of the poor. Some have said that this is a "fair" sales tax. My reply is that there is no such animal. They say that a manufacturing excise tax is a good tax and a fair sales tax. I deny it, because the manufacturer will pass it on to the consumer. We are told that we must continue with these nuisances because there is no other way. There is another way, but the proponents of this tax refuse to see it; that is, to tax wealth and riches of this country.

Some may inquire my reason for supporting processing taxes on farm commodities. Some may claim inconsistency on my part because of my opposition to nuisance and sales taxes, and concurrence in the imposition of processing taxes. My reply is that, first, processing taxes are levied to advance price levels to producers of farm commodities so that cost of production may be received by producers. Secondly, the disparity or difference between producer and consumer is so great that out of those disparities or differences processing taxes can be and are readily absorbed by the processors, handlers, and middlemen, thus imposing no hardship on the consumer.

Three-cent postage is an outrage—an imposition unwarranted, unjustified, and uncalled for. The Postmaster General has requested that this rate be continued, claiming that it is necessary to avoid a deficit, claiming that unless this rate is continued the postal expenses for 1936, which include steamship and aircraft subsidies and free carriage of Government mail, will be increased by about $75,000,000, all of which will become an added burden on the general revenues of the Treasury. That is a clear and deliberate statement of fact; but, if 3-cent postage is necessary in order to avoid that $75,000,000 deficit, so that we can continue steamship and aircraft subsidies, then I say let us do away with those subsidies once and for all time. Why should the poor taxpayer continue to be bedeviled and burdened with 3-cent postage.

The Ways and Means Committee recommends that all temporary provisions of the present revenue law which brings in additional revenue should be extended for a period of 2 years. Yet in the same breath the committee believes that these taxes and the higher postage rate should be removed as soon as the condition of the Treasury permits. I say that time has arrived now. The condition of the Treasury will permit this abundantly if you take wealth and incomes accordingly. So that you can determine for yourself just who and where nuisance and sales taxes pinch most, I am inserting at this point tables provided by the Committee on Ways and Means. [Applause.]

TABLE III—Summary

Actual revenue from temporary taxes and taxes temporarily increased for fiscal year 1934	$498,559,000
Estimated revenue from above for fiscal year 1935	428,781,000
Estimated revenue from above for fiscal year 1936 (if taxes are continued on existing basis)	438,991,000
Estimated annual loss of revenue on 1936 basis (if temporary taxes and rates are not continued)[1]	426,991,000
Estimated annual loss of revenue (if existing temporary law in respect to postal rates is not continued)	75,000,000
Grand total estimated annual loss of revenue (if existing temporary laws are not continued)	501,991,000

[1] Loss for fiscal year 1936 would be about $45,000,000 less than the annual figure given, since collections would be made in the first 2 months of the fiscal year 1936 on account of sales made in the last 2 months of the fiscal year 1935. (Postal rates decrease after June 30, 1935, under existing law.)

LAYING OF CORNERSTONE OF THE NEW POST OFFICE BUILDING AT BERGENFIELD, N. J.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by J. Austin Latimer, Special Assistant to the Postmaster General, at the cornerstone laying of a post office in my district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by J. Austin Latimer, Special Assistant to the Postmaster General of the United States, at the laying of the cornerstone of the new post-office building at Bergenfield, N. J., Saturday, June 15, 1935:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I am always very happy when my good friend and your good friend, James A. Farley, requests me to represent him personally, and this is particularly true today when I bring to his neighbors his personal greetings and best wishes, and his sincere regrets that he cannot be with you.

We of the Post Office Department always find it a pleasure to deal with your excellent Representative in Congress, and I am particularly happy to have the honor of appearing on this program with Congressman Kenney, Mayor Lindstrom, and Postmaster Stoughton.

This is an important day in the history of Bergenfield, for you have a just right to be proud of your first federally owned post-office building, of which we lay the cornerstone today. This new post office, costing approximately $36,000, will contain more than twice the floor space of your present rented quarters. It will be modernistic in design, as befits such a progressive and rapidly growing borough as Bergenfield. Our records indicate your splendid growth—your population practically quadrupled in the 20 years between 1910 and 1930; your postal receipts increased from $8,371 in 1910 to $19,821 in 1934.

I was interested to learn that the site of this new building was purchased from one Albert V. Demarest, and to note that John Z. Demarest was your first postmaster, appointed December 11, 1883, followed by Charles B. Hunter, February 23, 1911; George Breisacher, March 1, 1915; Alfred Christie, March 1, 1919; John G. Stoughton, February 15, 1924.

I understand that the Demarest family is one of the oldest in this vicinity, the first settler of that name locating here soon after the middle of the seventeenth century. According to this history, the territory now included in Bergenfield was first known as Schraalenburgh, from the Dutch meaning a barren knoll or hill. Soon after Matthew Nicols forfeited his grant from failure to settle sufficient families on the land, David Demarest, a French Huguenot appeared here. He did not attempt to secure patents from the governor but bought about 6,000 acres from the Hackensack and Tappan Indians, which shrewd move put him in peaceful relationship with them and gave him undisputed possession. I believe you did not become the borough of Bergenfield, however, until 1894.

Situated in a State that has been aptly termed "The Battleground of the Revolution", because nearly 100 battles, great and small, were staged on New Jersey's blood-stained soil—more than were fought in any other of the 13 States—this locality naturally witnessed the passings of both armies during that long struggle, but not only during the Revolution have you been in the midst of military movements. During the World War, I am told, nearly 1,000,000 troops passed through Bergenfield to Camp Merritt, the embarkation camp for overseas service, and to other training camps.

Yours has been an interesting past, and a busy progressive present. With your strategic location and other natural advantages, I predict for Bergenfield a prosperous and promising future. It would not surprise me if within the life of many of us present here today to lay the cornerstone of this modern and adequate post-office building, that your thriving community would grow to the point where even larger quarters would be needed to handle your constantly increasing postal needs, though in planning this building the Government has tried to look ahead and take care of the future somewhat as well as of the present.

The postal receipts have long been considered a barometer of business conditions throughout the country, so when a town outgrows its postal facilities it is a splendid indication of prosperity and well-being, not only in that section but in the country at large.

Shortly after the present Postmaster General took office, he found that while the postal receipts were a good barometer, they were some months late in registering the rise or fall of business, and being a business man in every sense of the word, Mr. Farley at once improved that. A modern system was installed so that the Department now knows on the 7th of each month the income for the previous month, and on the 20th we have the complete accounts.

The improved system now enables me to tell you that for the first 10 months of this fiscal year there has been a gain in postal receipts of 10⅓ percent over last year, in the smaller offices throughout the United States. I am happy to report that the present year—by which I mean the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935—promises to keep up the good report. April 1935, the tenth month of this fiscal year, records the best postal increase of any month since April 1930, and only a million dollars below that year. That month's gain is nearly 15 percent over April 1934, which translated into dollars and cents means that April 1935, shows a gain in postal receipts over the same month last year of more than $7,000,000. And the receipts for May to date show substantially the same corresponding increase over May of last year. The budget of the Postal Service has been balanced. Postmaster General Farley has freqently stated his intention of conducting the Postal Service as a public-service establishment rather than as a profit-making organization, and of returning to the people in improved service, and to the employees in improved working conditions, what is received over and above the postal expenditures.

Incidentally, the erection of every post office, such as this we celebrate today, is a milestone that marks the Nation's path back to prosperity. As I have said, the postal receipts are considered a barometer of business conditions throughout the country, and there is no more accurate index to our economic progress or decline than the post-office figures. When business goes up, the postal activities and resulting revenues increase. When business goes down, the post-office work declines in almost exact ratio.

The present healthy situation of the post-office budget is a direct reflex of the improvement in business conditions. The index points to a vast improvement all along the line. However, we are not out of the woods, of course, though we are well on our way. Not only does the substitution of black ink for red in drawing up the balance sheets emphasize this fact, but the contrast between the despair of the depression period and the hopefulness that now exists among our people tells the same story. As the Postmaster General so aptly stated at Philadelphia recently—wherever you turn you see the flowering of our business plants. It is an economic spring preceding the summer of content, and you may be assured that precautions will be taken by President Roosevelt against any unseasonable frost that might spoil the harvest. He, like New Jersey's own President, Woodrow Wilson, is a great leader; indeed "one of the few that have a right to rank with the true makers" and "far within old darkness' hostile lines" he is advancing and pitching "the shining tents of light."

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the House to the fact I was on my feet yesterday just before adjournment at the same time the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] had the floor, and I made a reservation of objection, which the RECORD does not show. I did that for the purpose of trying to find out what would happen to the omnibus bills, because I had been told earlier in the day they would not be considered today.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the request submitted by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] was unnecessary, because if the gentleman will read the Private Calendar rule he will find it is within the discretion of the Chair whether he will direct the Clerk to call Private Calendar bills on the third Tuesday in the month. There is a difference with reference to the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar on the first Tuesday and the third Tuesday of the month, and if the question had been raised the Chair states it would have been in the discretion of the Chair whether he would have ordered the calling of bills on the Private Calendar.

The Chair may also say, in explanation, that the Chair feels the Private Calendar may be taken up later in the session and the entire calendar called, including the omnibus bills. The Chair feels, however, that in the interest of an early adjournment we ought to consider these other major bills and send them to the Senate and consider the Private Calendar later on.

Mr. PITTENGER. May I thank the Chair for the statement, because the RECORD as it stands indicates that no one objected to what was being done, although I would have objected to the procedure if I had obtained the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. In view of the special order yesterday doing away with the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar today, the bills on the Private Calendar and omnibus bills would not be in order today even after we get through with the A. A. A. amendments?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The Chair may say in explanation of the statement made a while ago and in further amplification of that statement that the first section of the rule which applies to the first Tuesday in the month does not include omnibus bills. It provides that on the first Tuesday of the month the Speaker shall direct the calling of the Private Calendar, and the rule cannot be dispensed with except by a two-thirds vote of the House. The second paragraph, which covers the third Tuesday in the month, provides that the Speaker may direct the calling of the Private Calendar, and there is no provision to the effect it shall not be dispensed with.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this was all done deliberately and thoroughly and understood when the rule was adopted.

The SPEAKER. I am sure that is so, and I think the author of the rule and the House knew that when the rule was adopted.

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8492, with Mr. Cox in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, in the short time allotted me, I do not expect to be able to discuss this bill in detail, but under the wise provision that someone started years ago, giving us permission to revise and extend our remarks in the RECORD, there will be found at the end of my remarks a more complete discussion of the problem as a plain, real farmer sees it.

Mr. Chairman, I remember when I came to this Congress a little more than 2 years ago, one of the first friendships I formed was with the genial, brilliant gentleman from Illinois, who spoke yesterday for the processors. We had many things in common. We early became friends. We were both members of the Agricultural Committee. I said to him one day: "Why are you, a Chicago lawyer, on the Agricultural Committee?" He looked at me and smiled and said: "Governor, the stockyards are in my district." I needed no further explanation. I congratulate the brilliant and talented attorney for the wonderful defense he made of the stockyards, the packers, and the processors. We will hear much of that speech in the coming months.

I sincerely hope someone with the ability of the able Chairman of the Agricultural Committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], will give us a detailed answer to that marvelous array of, shall I say, misinformation from the farmers' point of view.

The millions and billions of dollars that the farmers are supposed to have received, according to that speech, would have made us all rich. Most of the money borrowed by farmers will be returned. Many millions of this borrowed money have already been returned. Many millions of the money that you set out in your wonderful array of figures have not even been appropriated.

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. I am sorry I cannot yield.

Mr. BEAM. I just want to correct the gentleman's statement by changing the word "appropriated" to "authorized." If the gentleman will read the RECORD, he will see that the statement says "authorized."

Mr. PIERCE. The RECORD will show the facts.

I want to compliment the chairman of this committee for his very careful consideration, not only of this bill but of every bill that came before the Agricultural Committee. He has certainly displayed a wonderful degree of generalship harmonizing the requests of the departments and the views of various members of his committee.

FARM PRICES ARE BETTER

The meat of this whole thing is this: When we passed the Agricultural Adjustment Act in June 2 years ago the farmer was getting less than one-third of the consumer's dollar and two-thirds of it was going to the processor and middleman. Today the best compilations we have show that the farmer or the producer is getting about 45 cents out of each consumer's dollar. The statement of my lawyer friend that the farmer had a perfect right to take his products to the ultimate consumer and get 100 cents of the consumer's dollar is certainly true, but what chance has the farmer of Ohio or the cattleman of Oregon or the wheat man of Nebraska to take the products of his farm to the ultimate city consumer and get anything for it? It has to go through the hands of the processor.

Fifty years or a little more ago, when I commenced my career in Oregon as a farm hand, the farmer was getting more than 50 cents out of each consumer's dollar. This has been gradually forced down, reaching 32 cents for the farmer's share. Since the present administration came into power it has gradually increased, until today the farmer is getting 45 cents of that dollar. Is it any wonder that the processor or the transportation man is getting alarmed and has flooded Members of the Congress with his propaganda, threatening us with the dire disaster that will follow if we pass these simple amendments, to do what? To make more effective the present act.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks for those who are interested in the farmer's point of view.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, Charles Beard, in his justly famous book, The Rise of American Civilization, opens his chapter on agriculture with words something like these, "In every age and in every clime where civilization has passed its most primitive form there has always appeared a small group of men devoted to finance, commerce, and industry. This group has always borne down with terrific oppression upon that group which derived its sustenance from agriculture." True in ancient, medieval, and modern days. The early agriculturists were mere slaves, often tied legally to the soil and sold with it when transfers of title were made. In Europe as well as in Asia those who produced the food and fibers that made possible industry and commerce were mere peasants, working for a bare subsistence, having nothing left over after the exactions of landlords and tax gatherers were met. They had no opportunity to share and to enjoy even the meager comforts which were then available for the average man of the time. When America became known to the farming and middle classes of Europe 300 years ago, a new vision gave hope to those who tilled the soil and produced the commodities that civilized men desire. It was a new vision, because they saw across the stormy ocean a land where they might acquire title to precious acres, where they might grow most of the things they needed, be enabled to sell their surpluses, and become free, independent landholders, enjoying the fruits of their labors and constructively building for the future.

FARM CONDITIONS HAVE CHANGED IN AMERICA

In our Colonial era, before the American Revolution, the larger percentage of the people lived on their own farms, where they were largely self-sustaining as to food, clothing, and housing. The Virginia farmer, as well as the farmer of New England, cured his own meat, ground his wheat and corn, constructed most of his own implements and tools, and made his own clothing. The average Colonial farmer sold about 5 percent of the commodities he produced. He consumed the other 95 percent of his products. The average present-day farmer must sell about 80 percent of commodities produced, either in grain or livestock.

Our governmental institutions were worked out and formulated principally by farmers, who had no other ideal than the economic and social conditions which prevailed in 1787. They were not able to pull aside the curtain that hid the future from their day. The wisest men of the day could not envision the America of today. The isolated, independent farmer of Revolutionary days is gone forever. Industrial evolution has settled his fate. In the place of the independent, individual farmer we have a highly industrialized farming population.

Not so many years ago, we lived in a world of scarcity. Clothing was scarce; food was scarce; the few simple machines were scarce. I can, myself, remember when my father's binder was the only one in the whole neighborhood, and they ran it during all the daylight that the long summer days afforded. Today, even the farm is mechanized, and the farmer is producing farm commodities on a commercial basis by means of hired labor and machinery, with little or no work of his own hands. Such a farmer is a commercial farmer. Conditions require such a farmer to use machinery in its most modern, up-to-date form.

On my own farm in Oregon, I have plowed my land with walking plows and gang plows, with horses and mules for power. On that farm some three different types of tractors have been used in the farming operations, as these machines have become perfected. Land, that it formerly cost me $1.50 an acre to plow with horses or mules, can today be plowed for less than 50 cents an acre. This includes not only the cost of fuel but the upkeep and the wear and tear, and all items considered. In other words, a farmer who has any quantity of plowing to do cannot afford, today, to hitch up his own horses against a Diesel engine, where the actual fuel cost is about 8 cents an acre for plowing. This machine age, in which we live, has brought about these same changes for the majority of all farming activities.

In his diary, George Washington complains of constant farm losses throughout his long years of experience and ownership. During the past hundred years, there has been some farm prosperity, and certainly a hopeful attitude on the part of the farmer. It appears that even this is gone, today. I know there are many who say the farmer has been extravagant and that his troubles have been brought on by his expensive and costly methods of operating. Speaking as a real farmer, who has operated under changing conditions during 50 years, I wish emphatically to assert, that I think the farmer is entitled to all of the necessities of life together with a reasonable share of modern luxuries and up-to-date machinery. The automobile and truck are a necessary part of the commercial farm equipment. The time was when the farmer could drive his own horse to the county seat. He raised the feed for that horse on his own land, and he had a horse growing up in the back pasture to drive when the other animal had outgrown its usefulness. Now, if that farmer wants to be a part of the world, and to enjoy a little of its society, and to keep his boys and girls around him on the farm, it is necessary for him to have the modern mechanical devices.

Rural electrification is a subject which is receiving much attention on the part of this administration. Electric light and power add much to country life. With the millions of electric horsepower going to waste down our streams, it is not right to ask those who live on the farms to do without this electrical energy which can be produced so cheaply. In order to facilitate rural electrical development, promoter's profits must be eliminated, and the natural resources used wisely for all mankind and not for the specially favored few.

PERIODS OF AGRICULTURAL PROSPERITY

When the World War was over and the great European emergency market for the American agricultural products was brought to a sudden end, there were very few who properly analyzed the situation. I remember the days of 1920 and 1921 very distinctly. I was then a large producer of cattle, hogs, and wheat. I often said "You will never see wheat less than $1.50 a bushel, and the fat steers and hogs will always bring at least 10 cents a pound." Along with millions of others, I could not envision the dark hours that were to follow for the farmer. We farmers of America 15 years ago were the most optimistic, happy group of tillers of the soil the world has ever seen. We had been large borrowers of money; we paid liberal interest; we paid high taxes; and we were sending our children to college; we were buying books and manufactured articles from industries. The future looked bright. We could not foresee the wreckage of our hopes and ambitions.

The three periods of great prosperity for the American farmer were periods of war. The first was that period from the formation of our Government in 1789 to 1815, the years in which Napoleon led the armies of the French from Moscow to Egypt. During those Napoleonic wars, every article the American farmer produced brought a good price and he was prosperous. Another great period of prosperity was during the time of the War between the States. Our third and last great period of prosperity was that period extending from 1914 to 1920. No one wants to see war return anywhere on this earth, even to create prosperity for any group or class. The point I want to make is that the prosperity justly due the farmer has been taken from him by the three groups mentioned by Beard, those "devoted to finance, commerce, and industry." This always happens unless their greedy hold is broken by some catastrophe such as war, which yields them such great profits from other sources that they temporarily relinquish their throttlehold upon the farmer. Without governmental backing or cooperative organization the individual farmer is as helpless as a mouse in a cat's paws.

CAUSES OF AGRICULTURAL COLLAPSE

There must be some sound basic reason or group of causes which have prevented general and permanent prosperity for the tillers of the soil, for, in America alone, the tiller in large part has also been the owner, especially in the North and West. Various causes for present unhappy conditions are given by students of agricultural economics, but I am convinced that we must accept a series of causes which combined to crush the landowner. First, he paid too large a share of the taxes for support of Government, because his wealth was tangible, and the holders of intangible wealth went scot free under an unjust system of taxation. Second, he paid too high a rate of interest on the money he was compelled to borrow for seasonal operations and for purchase of land. Third, he was compelled to pay excessive profits to speculators in land. Fourth, he was victimized by the excessive cost of farm machinery, due to uncurbed trusts. Fifth, excessive freight rates and preferential Government treatment of railroads, with their profits on watered stock, kept him from his markets. Sixth, tariff privileges were bestowed by Government on his oppressors and denied him. Seventh, speculation on commodity exchanges in prices of agricultural commodities made his selling operations a gamble. Eighth, producer organization was neglected by agricultural colleges and agencies, while they promoted quantity production. Their shortcomings and their manipulation by "finance, commerce, and industry" resulted in neglect of those aspects of farm life which should have been studied earlier. Ninth, the farmer follows a hazardous occupation subject to weather conditions and fluctuating markets.

With such an array of adverse circumstances, it is not strange that the farmer is today demanding an economic reorganization with governmental aid and control.

I am well aware of the fact that since the World War our greatest difficulty has been the loss of European markets, where we sold our surplus cotton, wheat, and hogs. Europe was ready to buy at a fair price because we bought of her, and because we owed her large sums of money borrowed to build our railroads and other improvements. That foreign market collapsed after the World War when an era of barrier tariffs was ushered in by our privileged friends in "finance, commerce, and industry." Nationalism became a fetish. Germany, France, England, and Italy strove to produce not only their own wheat and meat but, in fact, everything that they wanted to consume. That spirit of nationalism has driven from the high seas the trade of the world. No longer are our cargoes of farm commodities welcomed in foreign ports; they are now subject to quotas and to prohibitive tariff walls. Consequently, our surplus has been thrown back on the American markets. These markets have broken under the strain, and bankruptcy has followed in the wake of our orgy of nationalism. Ruin faces not only the farmers of America but the financiers as well, and also many an industrial concern that made the better part of its profits from articles manufactured and sold to the farming world.

Value has practically gone out of farming land and it is my judgment today, that if accurate figures were obtainable, it would be found that taxes alone are taking over one-half of the rental value of the farming lands of America. I know figures are often quoted showing that the larger percentage of the farms in America are not mortgaged and that a large percentage of the farmers are prosperous. I challenge those figures. In order to arrive at that conclusion every acre and half-acre lot in every suburban tract must be counted as a farm. The real honest-to-goodness farms are 80 percent mortgaged, from the Allegheny Mountains to the Pacific Ocean. When once mortgaged, the farms are practically lost as far as the farmer is concerned, for at prices which he can secure now and probably in the future, there is little or no hope that the farmer can pay the expenses, taxes and interest, and wipe out the mortgage.

GOVERNMENT AID NEEDED

Left to his own resources, the American farmer cannot recover. He is not only ruined financially himself, but he is pulling down with him the industrial and financial world. The ill-fated Farm Board was created to help restore his prosperity, it failed because it was dominated by that group devoted to finance, commerce, and industry.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act has helped to bring back partial prosperity. We must now enact into law these amendments, H. R. 8492, so that the fight may still continue to restore parity in exchange to the farming community. By that I mean that a given quantity of farm commodities should purchase the same quantity of tax receipts, farm implements, or other articles that the farmer must have, which would have been purchased in the base period of 1909 to 1914.

Full well do I know that many say "Let the farmer alone. He is all right. Do not hamper him with laws." That doctrine can lead only to trouble. Under present conditions we must have controlled production or financial failure for the American farmer. He is still holding a long-view objective and hopes for a more abundant economy for the industrial groups. He is sure that with a relief from the exactions of the financial group there ought to be a profitable market for everything he will be able to produce.

IMPROVEMENTS WROUGHT BY TRIPLE A ACT

When this administration came into power farm prices were approximately 35 percent below the relation of farm prices to industrial prices which had held for the 20-year period prior to 1920. Farm prices are still 25 percent below that relation.

Two years ago this June month we passed the Agricultural Administration Act, known as the "triple A." It was a bold, far-seeing, brave, generous conception. It was an attempt to give the farmer a larger percentage of the dollars that the consumers paid for the commodities produced. Careful compilations made at that time showed that the producer received about one-third of the consumer's dollar; or, in other words, it took an average of two-thirds of the amount that the consumer paid to cover transportation and pay the profits and expenses of the middle man and the processor. Never lose sight of the fact that the object of the triple A is to help and assist the farmer to get a better price for his commodities. The real purpose of this act was to give the farmer a few more cents out of the consumer's dollar. Careful compilations show that, at the present time, the farmer is now getting about 45 cents out of each consumer's dollar instead of the 33⅓ cents, which he had under the old system. Those extra cents out of the consumer's dollar have gone to the man who milked the cows, raised the hogs and produced the wheat. No wonder the processor is up in arms! He has simply flooded the Congress for months with his propaganda, begging, threatening; in fact, doing everything humanly possible, and many inhuman things belonging to the category of the nether regions, to prevent any amendment that would strengthen the Triple A Act. I know there are a few farmers who will contend that they have never been benefitted by this act. They are simply deceived, or are the victims of this propaganda. They have listened to the siren voice of the processor who would like to have the farmers produce commodities in immense quantities so that he could get his rake-off. The processor has been greedy, and he has been short-sighted, possibly he has sometimes used this power corruptly.

Rates for processing and transportation remain the same whether crops are small or large. In good years and poor years, those charges are like the laws of the Medes and the Persians. They hold through all conditions and change only to be more firmly fixed. They certainly charge all the traffic will bear, and then some.

FURTHER CONTROL NEEDED

Between 1929 and the spring of 1933, agricultural commodities dropped in price 63 percent, and during the same period the output dropped only 6 percent. Farm implements during the same time dropped in price only 6 percent, but they dropped in output 80 percent. No wonder there was trouble. Implement makers had control of production. Farmers did not have that control.

In spite of the drought and agricultural curtailments of crops, the total volume of farm commodities in 1934 was only 15 percent under the production of 1929, while industrial production was off 42 percent during the same period. In 1870, 53 percent of the gainfully employed were on farms; they received 26½ percent of the total income. In 1932, 62 years later, 23 percent of the gainfully employed were on farms, but they received only 7½ percent of the income. All the immense profits that had resulted from the use of machines and modern methods had been absorbed by that group mentioned by Beard, those devoted to "finance, commerce, and industry."

PRICE FIXING NOT INCLUDED

I have never in the past been an advocate of prices fixed by Government mandate. It has never seemed to me possible for the Government to fix the prices without injury to many people and many interests. I am free to confess that my service on the Agricultural Committee for three sessions of Congress has somewhat softened my opposition to price fixing, and, after listening to hours of hearings, I am beginning to wonder if we may not be approaching the time when fixed prices for farm commodities will be a part of the agricultural program. The Triple A Act does not attempt to do this. It is based upon the theory that if we could cut down the amount of our farm commodities so that we would consume what we raised, and provide a normal carry-over granary, the prices of farm commodities would regulate themselves.

BENEFIT PAYMENTS ARE LIFESAVERS

Those who cooperate in reducing the quantity so that there shall be no exportable surplus are rewarded by benefit payments. I do not know what farmers in some parts of my district would have done had it not been for the money they received by way of the benefit payments. In many counties that I represent on this floor there are scores of farmers who have found those benefit payments a sort of an insurance, enabling them to pay taxes, clothe their families, and send their children to school.

FARM INCOME HAS INCREASED

Substantial improvement has been made under the present administration. In 1932 the farm cash income was $4,328,000,000. In 1934 it was $6,100,000,000, an increase of 41 percent. The value of this advance was partially lost by the fact that during the same period nonagricultural commodities advanced 15 percent over the price in 1932.

About 23 percent of the Nation's gainfully employed are farming. In 1932 that 23 percent of our population received only 7½ percent of total income. In 1934 that same farming population received 10⅕ percent. The farmer is not getting one-half of his share yet, but there has been a real improvement.

In 1934 the purchasing power of units of farm products averaged 73 percent of the pre-war level. In March 1933, at the low point, it stood at 55 percent of pre-war level.

UNFAIR PRACTICES MUST BE STOPPED

There never has been justification for raising the price of flour and bread as the millers and bakers have done. They have forced flour and bread prices higher, using the processing taxes for an excuse for their unjustifiable increases. Actually the increase in the price of bread has been 2 cents a loaf; the farmer got out of that increase one-half of 1 cent a loaf. The cotton farmer received about 8 cents increase on a pair of overalls. Other articles were in like proportion, but the processor and the seller reaped immense profit. A neighbor in my home county reported to me last week that wheat was down to 51 cents a bushel and local flour $1.84 for a 50-pound sack. At this price for flour, wheat should sell for $1.64, including the processing tax of 30 cents; the farmer should net $1.34. Someone is making too much. Why not divide more equally? It is our business to regulate this. A congressional investigation should be made at once, and, if it reveals what I expect, it should be followed by drastic legislation next session.

AMENDMENTS OVERCOME CONSTITUTIONAL DIFFICULTIES

The National Industrial Recovery Administration made an attempt to force the business world to sell to the consumer at reasonable prices and to pay reasonable wages. Unfortunately, the chiseler, the obstructionist, and the courts have ruined that experiment. The Agricultural Adjustment Act is also a finely conceived attempt to give to agriculture a chance to exist, a chance to receive a reasonable price for the products of labor, so that interest and taxes may be paid, so that the steady march of the American farmer toward peasantry may be stayed. It must not be ruined by court decree or legislative act.

These triple A amendments, which our Committee on Agriculture is offering today and asking this House to pass, amend the present law in several important particulars. They are carefully drawn to meet the requirements laid down by the Supreme Court in their recent Schechter decision. In that case, which is now history, the Supreme Court held that Congress could not delegate its legislative power, except within certain limitations. This Supreme Court decision is the most important and far-reaching decision that has come from that august tribunal since the Dred Scott decision, 78 years ago.

Our American citizens demand an end to the present inhuman and cruel economic system upheld by the Supreme Court in the Schechter case. We must find a way to legislate within the Constitution so that Government shall be allowed to act in all respects for the protection of the citizens. We believe we have provided, in this pending bill, all the specifications and rules, all of the conditions that the Supreme Court will find necessary to make an order of the Secretary of Agriculture constitutional.

COMMODITIES INCLUDED IN THE AMENDMENTS

The commodities under discussion for inclusion through amendment were fruits, vegetables, and milk. Canned fruits and vegetables were omitted from the operation of the act because it was believed by the committee that, in a large measure, vegetables and fruits for canning were produced by farmers very closely tied in with the canners. In many cases the canning and producing are cooperative enterprises. It was thought by the committee that it was not best to have any agreements or orders pertaining to these industries at the present time. Hence, they were omitted, as were apples. Other fresh fruits and vegetables remained in the list. Soybeans and tobacco were included because it was thought by the majority of the committee that the same rules that applied to fresh vegetables and fruit could be applied to tobacco and soybeans. The most important commodity covered by these amendments is milk and its products. Milk today is a necessity and its production and distribution is a utility charged with public use. There is no food that our people depend upon as much as milk and its products. It is believed that when the final test comes before the Supreme Court this law will be found to be constitutional. I regret to state that it was concluded by the committee that it would not be best to include wool and mohair because we are still importers of wool and rules were difficult to formulate.

PROCESSING TAXES

Processing taxes of nearly a thousand million dollars have been collected under the act; and should the Supreme Court of the United States declare unconstitutional the original Triple A Act, and if there be no prohibitive legislation, the processors may demand that the Government return to them this immense sum of money. This would be most unfair and unjust because, generally, the processor has passed on to the consumer the charge for the amounts of money collected. It would be unjust to repay to processors millions of dollars which they paid in the first instance, and then made their customers pay back to them in the higher price of the processed goods.

It is the belief of the committee that this amendatory act will prevent suits from being filed that will have any standing in a court of law or equity. For this one reason, if for no other, this bill should be passed now at this session. The act also provides that in the future this processing tax shall be collected under the taxing power of the United States, using an entirely different power upon which to base the right to levy the tax, one that the courts, we feel certain, will hold constitutional.

CONTROL OF SURPLUS AND IMPORTS

In this bill, H. R. 8492, now pending, there is a provision that 30 percent of our customs duties shall be kept in a separate fund and be used by the Secretary of Agriculture to assist in an effort to bring back price parity between agriculture and industry. This will amount to about $100,000,000 annually and may be used to—

(1) Encourage the exportation of major agricultural commodities and products thereof by the payment of benefits in connection with the exportation thereof or of indemnities for losses incurred in connection with such exportation; (2) encourage the domestic consumption of such commodities or products by diverting them, by the payment of benefits or indemnities, or by other means, from the normal channels of trade and commerce; (3) purchase or lease, on behalf of the United States, submarginal agricultural and grazing lands; and (4) finance adjustments in the quantity planted or produced for market of agricultural commodities.

This provision follows some of the principles of the Grange debenture plan and the McNary-Haugen bill.

Particularly will these provisions benefit the Pacific Northwest, where we annually raise 80,000,000 bushels of wheat, more than half of which must be exported from that coast. In that great region we are handicapped by a railroad rate of 42 cents a bushel on wheat to the Missouri River. Under the pending bill the Secretary of Agriculture will be authorized to use money to export that regional surplus as he did a year ago when he took 28,400,000 bushels of surplus wheat out of the Northwest at a loss to the A. A. A. fund of a little more than six and a half million dollars, or 23 cents a bushel, for the purpose of stabilizing prices.

There is also another provision in this bill that should endear it to the heart of every agriculturist, and that is the provision that will make it possible for the President practically to prohibit the importation of agricultural products from foreign countries. He shall do this when he learns through his fact-finding boards that the importation of these farm commodities is not necessary for the maintenance of our people or to fill a normal granary, but that such imports are used to break our domestic markets or to "render ineffectual or materially interfere with any program or operation to the Secretary of Agriculture to benefit agriculture." I believe the day is close at hand, unless there is a decided change in the nationalistic sentiment so prevalent in the world today, when we must absolutely prohibit the importation of any agricultural product that can be produced in the United States. This section of the bill probably goes as far as we ought to go at the present time.

THIS CAREFULLY PREPARED BILL SHOULD PASS

I can assure you no bill of this session could have received more care and attention, more thoughtful study. For hours, days, and weeks the Agricultural Committee has labored faithfully, and we believe we have brought for final passage before this House the most important bill of this session. It would be a calamity to see this bill fail of final enactment. It would not only be a calamity but it would be an irreparable disaster. Congressmen who represent particularly the industrial and financial districts should vote for this bill for their own safety and the safety and well-being of our entire people. Those devoted to finance, commerce, and industry are dependent upon farm prosperity.

The American farmer will not be forced to peasantry without one most desperate struggle. He and his family have tasted of the better things of life. He has the right to vote and he will rise up with the power that he has. He may be driven to follow demagogues, he may wreck this very Government itself, but he will not tolerate loss of home, occupation, and self-respect. He has lost through court decision the opportunity to save his farm from foreclosure pending return of values. This Congress has been gravely negligent in omitting legislation providing a moratorium by means already held constitutional in the Minnesota case.

We who sit in this Hall today may be very conservative compared to the group that may follow us. Should this bill fail of passage, or should it fail to accomplish the purpose that we believe it will accomplish, then danger threatens. A vote for this bill is a vote to establish stability and confidence in the farming world.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, the committee has worked diligently upon this bill for 4 months, and since the middle of February. There was another bill before the committee, which was referred to yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BEAM], which was open to the objections that he recited, but there is no one of those objections that is relevant to the bill now before us. I could spend 2 hours in showing you this, but the best proof of it is that when the original bill came to a vote in the committee it passed the committee by a vote of 11 to 13 and then was recalled and a new bill substituted, which new bill eliminated the faults of the old one.

The new bill is now before you. It is not open to any of the objections proposed by the gentleman from Illinois—not one of them. For example, the gentleman referred to the colloquy he had with Mr. Davis with respect to 1,000,000 being affected by the old bill. That was possibly true at that time, because the old bill related to all processors, to all handlers, and to every grocery man, either at a crossroads or in the cities, who might be selling a can of peas or a pound of potatoes. All of those things have been taken out of the pending bill. It does not affect retailers or producers. There is nothing left of them. I do hope that when gentlemen come to vote upon this bill they will make up their minds on the facts with regard to the bill now before us, and on nothing else. Do not be misled by arguments directed against a bill that is dead and has been buried in the committee for months.

Mr. Chairman, there was an old agriculture which had to do with old-style things, where the farmer was a self-sufficient man and self-contained man living with his family upon the farm. They produced and made for themselves nearly everything needed. I can remember my grandmother making tallow candles. I can remember the old spinning wheel, and so on. In my 15 minutes I cannot dwell on these things. But there is now a new agriculture, and the agriculturalist is in business just as much as the banker or the merchant or the broker who deals in stocks or bonds. This new agriculture is a commercial business. Under conditions that have been existing since I was a boy in northwest Iowa, covering a period of time greater than I care to admit here, agriculture has been broke almost twice in every generation of mankind. I have seen the farms sold. The time comes in the life of nearly every family on the farm when the father dies and the mother dies and the eldest son puts a mortgage on the farm to pay out the other children. Then adversity comes. Prices go down. However diligent and honest and careful he may be, the owner finds himself overwhelmed by conditions which he cannot remedy or overcome, and for which he was not responsible.

After that I have often seen the sheriff come to sell that old homestead farm. It has happened in my family, and it may have happened in your family. I am asserting that agriculture has been broke or "busted", to use a very suggestive term, practically once, and possibly twice, in every generation of mankind, as the game has been practiced out on the farms of Iowa. And the theory has been that agriculture must take what it can get under a sort of seepage theory. Let the rich and those who are in commercial businesses prosper—and I want them to prosper; I am not going to make a demagogic speech here—but let those at the top prosper, and then there will be sufficient seepage from above down below to the farmer, the agriculturalist. The theory is that it will be a good deal like Lazarus and the rich man. There will be enough crumbs fall from the rich man's table so that Lazarus can at least eke out a living. So it has come to pass that many folks believe that the farmer should have only the necessities. I have here in my hand a letter from a man who is a great packer in the city of Newark, Ohio. He pretends to tell me, who have lived on a farm in northwestern Iowa and watched farmers all of my life, that the trouble with the farmers is, first, that they spend too much time in town; and, second, that they do not limit themselves to necessities. The letter is dated March 22. There is no group of men on earth who work so much and so diligently and for so many hours as do the farmers. In the summertime they work 12 and 14 hours per day and in the wintertime 10 hours per day. Necessities! So this packer says that they spend so much for luxuries that they have nothing left for necessities. I hold it to be true that the best things we can do for all of our people, whether they work in the mines or in the textile factory or on a farm, is to give them sufficient income so that they can live in comfort and culture and have the beautiful things and good schools and good churches and good homes and all of the other things that twentieth century civilization calls for. There is no reason why a farmer should not have an automobile. If there is any one man on earth who ought to have an automobile it is the farmer. I do not have one here in Washington and do not have to have one. I can take the street cars and the taxis, but the farmer is so isolated that he must have and use one. His wife and family should have schooling and churches and fine things that make for culture and for decent living. I am willing to go with the textile boys. I want their workmen to have the same kind of treatment. I want the boys who work in the mines to have the same kind of treatment, but the farmers have not yet had it.

There are too many folks who are like the man who wrote this letter, who think the farmers ought to limit themselves to necessities—no silk dress for the farmer's wife, no automobile for the farmer, a crust of bread and a bone is enough, existence only. That is where a lot of opposition to this bill arises.

I cannot dwell on that. I have only 15 minutes. There has been too much interference with the farmer. He is interfered with by the grain importations. We ought to give him the American market. We ought to prevent blackstrap and tapioca coming in from foreign fields, so that the farmer would have a right to that market. The farmers have been compelled to compete with Government agencies. For example, there are the reclamation projects. The Government is paying for them. If the Government would set up a Government textile factory and start the manufacture of textiles, what would the boys in the East and the South say to that? But that is exactly what the Government is doing with the farmer. Then there is the spread between price of agricultural products as sold by the farmer and as paid for by the consumer. It is entirely too much. One could make an oration on that for hours. I went down here the other day and saw potatoes au grautin at 40 cents a service. The trouble with the farmers is that they cannot raise potatoes "au grautin" and get $50 to $100 a bushel for them. If we could regulate these things so as to give them a proper and decent percentage of the price the consumer pays, the farmer would be much better off; and possibly we would not have to put into force these positive ways of assuring them a parity price and of assuring the cost of production for the things that society gets from them. No man has a right to eat the bread they produce without paying for its cost. No group has a right to mooch upon some other group.

Gentlemen yesterday talked about parity. The gentleman from Chicago [Mr. BEAM], able as he is, told you that farm prices had doubled. Yes. What does that mean? Double zero, and what do you get? Double corn at 10 cents, and what does that mean? Twenty cents. Yes; corn has doubled. Wheat at 30 cents. Double that. Sixty cents for wheat. Yes; wheat has doubled; but, Mr. Chairman, when you get down to the actual proposition in hand, you will find that everything that the farmer buys has quadrupled, so that today the official figures, without dispute, show something that the gentleman did not say yesterday. Why do not they tell the whole truth? A half truth is as deceptive sometimes as a fraudulent statement.

They ought to be fair about it. The farmer's price has not come yet to parity. He is now, this day, carrying a heavy burden in the economic race with other business men.

How can he compete that way? How can I succeed in a race with you if a 15-pound ball is chained to my feet? The bill has not been in operation above 2 years. Farm commodity prices have improved because there has been a devaluation in the dollar, but the principal thing that has made the approach toward parity is because there has been an unprecedented drought. The crop was cut short, so that you get a good price for corn if you have any, but you do not have any. When you talk about the rise in the price of corn, you are talking about a bushel of corn that the farmer does not have.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. In other words, the parity in price does not necessarily mean parity in income?

Mr. GILCHRIST. No; nor in prosperity.

I do not know of a single farmer that would not be willing to give the boys in the industrial field prices that will put them up to parity. Since I have been in Congress I have voted for every one of these things that would return good income and wages to workingmen.

Now the time has come for you to understand this bill—not H. R. 5585 under discussion a few months ago, which the Committee refused to put on passage.

There has been a great deal of misinformation and misunderstanding in describing this bill. I have letters from men in which they said that it will put a processing tax on every product the farmer raises. That is not so. This does not put a processing tax on a single article that did not heretofore have a processing tax on it or was not subject heretofore to such a tax. This bill does not increase processing taxes upon anything. It adds no new taxes. Why not be fair about it?

A certain chamber of commerce said that the bill took away every semblance of human rights. The bill does not do anything of the kind. As now written, it simply adds a few regulations to cover certain products such as milk and a few of what they call "specialty products", which experience has shown is necessary, in order to do what? Why, in order to give the farmer an honest price and a decent living.

Mr. Chairman, at Springfield, Ill., last week there was a gathering of folks who called themselves "Grass Root" Republicans. At that meeting Governor Lowden was the principal speaker. Governor Lowden is an Iowa boy, born in a little village in Iowa. His father was a blacksmith. He went forth into the world from a humble home and became the Governor of a great State. He is revered and loved by hundreds of thousands of farmers and of Republicans. He made a speech in 1926, and I will just quote one sentence from the speech on account of my short time.

> Under present conditions we have this anomoly: The farmer is not nearly so likely to suffer from a short crop as from a bumper crop.

He wrote an article published in the World's Work, and another one for the Review of Reviews, in which he said——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST] has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Iowa 3 additional minutes.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I will not continue to read the quotation, but I will put it in my extension of remarks. That is the theory that Governor Lowden has had during these years. That is the theory of this bill and of the A. A. A. It is the theory of Henry Wallace, another great Iowa product. God Almighty has had a great deal to do with raising farm commodity prices because of the drought that has existed, but I think the Agricultural Act has had something to do with it also. Furthermore, Governor Lowden at that convention last week said:

> So long as we have a protective tariff for the benefit of industry we must give agriculture a corresponding benefit for that portion of the product of the soil which goes into domestic consumption.

And this bill is for the purpose of giving a corresponding benefit to agriculture.

I stand for those things. It is good Republicanism. It is espoused by such men as Governor Lowden and other Republicans, and it is not partisan. I think everyone on the Republican side of this committee is going to vote for this bill. I think all the Democratic Members, except possibly one, will vote for it also. There is absolutely no partisanship in this bill. It will help to restore farm prices, and until this is done there will be no prosperity for anyone.

I cannot close without paying my small tribute to the Chairman of this great Committee on Agriculture. Splendid as he is in character, intelligence, and ability, it is a pleasure to work under him as we have done for the last 4 months. It is also a pleasure to work with my colleague, the leader on the Republican side of that committee, Mr. HOPE, of Kansas. There are just two men in this Congress who know all about agricultural legislation and agricultural regulations, and if I had to tell you their names, one of them would be MARVIN JONES, of Texas, and the other would be CLIFFORD HOPE, of Kansas. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STARNES].

Mr. STARNES. Mr. Chairman, we have before us one of the most important measures that this House has been called upon to consider at this session of Congress. I think that our able chairman and the members of that committee are to be congratulated on the unremitting toil and effort they have put forth in order to bring to us this perfected bill.

There have been voices raised in criticism of this measure. This measure seeks to do simple, elemental justice to the greatest consuming group in American life today, the American farmer. Those voices come from a section which has long prospered at the expense of the farmers of this Nation and other sections of this country. We should either have a tariff for all or a tariff for none. That is the real battle cry of the American farmer today. For more than a century in the history of this country the American farmer has paid tribute to a certain section of this country in the form of a tariff, and it is nothing more, as I stated in the beginning, than simple, elemental justice that the farmers should receive just recognition at this late hour. If we destroy the processing tax feature of this measure we destroy the heart of the measure.

What does the farmer seek at our hands? He is not coming here asking for any special privileges. No high-powered or highly paid propagandists have been raising their voices in behalf of the farmer, but we are merely giving to the farmers of this country justice so long delayed. We must restore the prosperity of the farmer before we can restore the prosperity of this Nation.

What has the A. A. A. done? Let us speak of terms of benefit when we speak of legislation. We have been accused of passing destructive legislation. We have been accused of attempting to pass legislation which would destroy the initiative of the American citizen, which would destroy individualism, which tended toward collectivism and communism; but this measure gives to the greatest single group in this country an opportunity to live and to live decently. The farmer asks for no special favor at your hands and mine. He simply asks for a square deal. He seeks not special privileges. He does not want a dole, and he resents the idea of charity. All he asks is that he be placed on a parity with industry and other organized groups in this country who have been able, through organization methods, to get special benefits from this Congress. [Applause.]

The administration of the A. A. A. has been of untold benefit to the farmer. It has sought to balance production with demand. It has revived a prostrate agriculture and breathed the hope of life in the hearts of millions of our people. The following statistics will show the financial benefits to the Nation by reason of the operation of the principles of the A. A. A., to wit:

1. Farm cash income:
1933	$5,051,000,000
1934	$6,100,000,000
2. Percent increase in cash income, 1934 over 1932	41
3. Percentage of rental and benefit payments to farm cash income:
1933	2.6
4. Index of average farm prices (pre-war 100):
In December 1933	78
In December 1934	101
5. Percent farm prices were of parity:
December 1933	67
December 1934	80
6. Number of production control contracts in effect:
At close of 1933	1,925,000
At close of 1934	3,699,000
7. Percent of total farm cash income in 1933 contributed by commodities now covered by production-control programs	49.9
8. Number of marketing agreements and licenses in effect:
At close of 1933	60

The farmer is told by the industrialists that by subscribing to the principles of the A. A. A. he is losing his initiative, individualism, and his constitutional liberty. The industrialist argues that the farmer should be permitted to work as many hours per day and night as he desires, to produce in unlimited quantities, and to sell in an open and unprotected market. He is willing for the farmer to produce and sell cotton at 5 cents per pound, corn at 25 cents per bushel, wheat at 33 cents per bushel, and hogs and livestock at a price below the price of production. Strange to relate, the industrialist does not practice the theory and doctrine he asks the farmer to accept. Some figures with reference to this phase of the problem will prove illuminating. The volume of farm production in 1934 was only 15 percent below that of 1929. By contrast, the volume of industrial production in 1934 was 42 percent below that of 1929. Industrial prices received the support of a greater curtailment of production than did agricultural prices. While prices of industrial products declined 14 percent, farm prices declined 40 percent.

The effect of increasing the farm cash income since 1932 has been to increase retail and wholesale trade. A study made in 10 Southeastern States showed that shipments of industrial goods from 16 Northeastern States had increased 38.8 percent during the year ending June 30, 1934, as compared with the year ending June 30, 1933.

The effect of the increase in farm cash income has enabled the farmer to pay his debts, save his farm, buy necessities for his family, and to indulge in the fond hope that his years of unremitting toil will be rewarded by raising the social and economic standards of his family life.

Let us pass this measure for the benefit of those who have toiled through the years without asking special favors at our hands. They have shown a wonderful spirit of cooperation. During the past year they have expressed their sentiments toward this measure by cooperating with the program of the Department of Agriculture and by their votes on the question of continuing the policies of the A. A. A. They ask no more of us than to give this program an opportunity to function. We can do no less. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STARNES] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY].

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, since I have been a Member of this House I have supported almost every bill that has come before the House which had for its purpose relief for agriculture. I represent a constituency that has few, if any farms. My objection to this particular bill, however, is the continuation of that vicious, un-American, and discriminatory processing tax, because I believe it is nothing but what its name implies, the process of making the underpaid worker and underpaid consumer of the cities provide the funds to enable the farmer to get out of the depression caused by the concentration of wealth in the hands of the few. My personal opinion is that most of this money from the processing tax does not go to create more purchasing power among the farmers, but it goes to the bankers who hold the mortgages and charge the farmers the high interest upon their loans made on agricultural lands in the good years. Processing taxes, parity prices, and a lot of the other buncombe will not help the farmer until his debt burden is scaled down and refinanced.

The Frazier-Lemke bill, in my opinion, was a practical way by which the farmer could be brought back to his own, in this country. That bill provided for the refinancing and reorganizing of the capital structure of the farms in much the same way that big business is refinancing its debts under the Bankruptcy Act. Mr. Wallace let the cat out of the bag as to the real, underlying purpose of this processing tax, when in his remarks before the committee, he said that the processing tax would be figured high enough to make the parity price include the mortgage and the interest charges that the farmer has to pay to his overlords and overseers, the bankers.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, it is unfair for us to pass legislation which compels the poor of the cities to help the poor of the farms—the blind to lead the blind. It is absolutely unfair to dip into the almost empty pockets of the people of the city for a processing tax to help the farmer to get prices sufficiently high to pay the unequal tribute to the bankers that now makes farming unprofitable. Through the processing taxes the consumer is taxed to pay the farmer a bonus to enable the farmer to raise less to charge the consumer more! If this is not the most illogical, asinine, and cockeyed plan that could be conceived, I am unable to reason. I wonder how many of the farmers who have received processing-tax checks have actually been able to buy more than the necessities of life? I have not yet seen a statement from the Department of Agriculture as to how many farmers have been able to reduce the debts upon their farms by reason of these processing taxes.

The theory of the processing tax is that it comes out of the processor. Everybody knows the tax comes from the consumer. For instance, let us take wheat and the finished product produced from wheat, bread, which the poorest citizens of this country, many of them on relief, need as part of their daily diet. Mr. Wallace says a bushel of wheat will produce 40 loaves of bread. If he is no better at baking bread than this statement would indicate, it would seem that it were better for him to farm the farmers of America than to engage in the baking business. I have been told by those who ought to know, that with 58 pounds of flour to a bushel of wheat, approximately 67½ loaves of bread can be produced from that bushel. I refer to the common chain store bakery kind of bread and not the kind they tell us mother used to make. This being the case, it does not take much of a mathematician to figure that with a process tax of 30 cents a bushel on wheat and the market price of 35 cents a bushel, that the processing tax plus the market price makes 65 cents, or 1 cent additional per loaf of bread cost to the consumer. But the price of bread since these processing taxes were levied, has increased approximately 2 cents a loaf. This means that the consumer of bread, be he on relief where one loaf of bread can mean the difference between an empty stomach and a full one, or be he a small wage earner with little enough with which to support his family, has to pay this increase of nearly 2 cents per loaf of bread. This means that the processing tax has cost the consumer of the finished product of wheat, approximately $1.37 per bushel more when he gets that bushel in loaves of bread than it did before this tax levy. Thus the consumers of the country are paying the chain stores or the bakeries or somebody else, even 1 cent extra for each 1-cent collection by the processing tax supposedly finding its way into the pocket of the farmer. Thus, in addition to being a levy to supposedly help the farmer, the process tax becomes a disguise and an excuse for more price gouging from the consumer.

Pursuing this line of thought, if the farmer bought bread on the market he would pay out in increased cost to the processor and the seller of bread the 1 cent that he gets under the guise of a processing tax.

I am perfectly willing to vote again for a bill like the Frazier-Lemke bill which has for its purpose a refinancing and reduction of farm mortgage charges, but I object to a policy that makes one group of the masses of this country reach into the pockets of another underpaid and hungry group to help bring the agriculture out of a financially rigged and Wall Street conducted depression.

Mr. Chester Davis, in an article in yesterday's paper, had this to say about the lack of any need for more processing taxes on the food and clothing of America's "still forgotten" masses:

DAVIS, OF A. A. A., GIVES HIS ANNUAL REPORT

A. A. A. Administrator C. C. Davis reported today on his organization's 1934 activities and dedicated it to a policy of "controlled expansion, in step with increasing domestic and foreign demand."

He said it was up to industry to produce further improvement in farm income.

"Since the agricultural price level is now being largely supported by shortages due to an unprecedented drought, it is doubtful whether further increases in agricultural prices would be practical at present", Davis wrote.

"Improvement in the exchange value of agricultural for industrial products can be accomplished, then, either through lowering industrial prices and costs or through such a rise in city buying power as would support an increase in farm prices and in the farmer's share of the national income."

I submit that if you pass this bill every Member who represents a city will find it costly, for the one thing their constituents will remember is that it reaches into the pockets of these underpaid and unemployed citizens for their few remaining pennies.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. The best way to get this money would be by a general tax levy, instead of taxing the unemployed, as happens in the processing-tax procedure.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I propose to offer an amendment when the bill is read under the 5-minute rule, so that the consumers of the city will know just how much this "poor-help-the-poor" program of farm relief we have had for 2 years is costing them. I will propose that each processed article bear a tag showing just what the processing tax on the article amounts to. Then we shall know whether or not the consumers are footing the whole bill, when the bankers who hold the farmers in bondage to huge mortgage and interest payments should be the ones to pay for the farmers' recovery.

Mr. PIERCE. The facts of the case are that the farmer gets but one-half a cent out of each dollar of increase.

Mr. O'MALLEY. It is time the consumers knew what was being done in the name of the processing tax, and not compel them to be the goats for an atheistic, unsound, and suicidal plan that literally flies in the face of the Creator by paying money to destroy the bounty which His benign hand has lavished upon America, the favored of all nations under His firmament.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question for the purpose of getting information with regard to the processing tax.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I have promised all my time. If later I find I have any time remaining, I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RICH. I am sorry the gentleman cannot yield.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the general purposes of this bill. I make no criticism of the committee members. I realize they have worked faithfully and deserve the commendation of the Membership of this House.

I believe, however, that certain provisions of the bill in an important respect deserve criticism.

My particular criticism is directed at the nonbasic commodities provisions of the bill.

The provisions relating to these commodities prescribe no uniform system by which the farmers of the country on an equal basis may receive the benefits of this bill. Instead of providing a common standard under which the growers of any products may qualify for the benefits under this bill the committee have designated certain specific products and excluded all others.

This method of procedure has eliminated from the benefits of this bill certain important products which were operating under marketing agreements in 1934. Canned cherries, peaches, olives, and asparagus, all heretofore under marketing agreements, are excluded from benefits under this bill. For instance, in 1933 and 1934, in my own State cling peaches were handled under a marketing agreement to the advantage of the industry. They are eliminated from the benefits of this bill. Cling peaches are of no particular value except for canning so the whole cling-peach industry is excluded without any just reason. All canned fruit is eliminated.

The California Legislature at a recent session by act provided for the State to cooperate with the Federal Government in carrying out marketing agreements. That act provided that all the farmers of our State on showing the approval of a sufficient majority of the producers of any one product would be entitled to the benefits of the act. All agricultural products were intended to be placed on an equality and have an equal opportunity to come into the program.

The bill before the House plays favorites. Those favored cooperate to exclude other producers. Congress selects the particular products that may get the benefits. The others go without this aid. If this plan of aiding agriculture is just and practical, it should be applied to all the farmers of the country on equal terms. New products are brought in while old ones, without reason, are excluded. The right to participate in a recovery plan should not be made a special privilege without just discrimination. No congressional committee should deny to any particular class of farmers the benefits of this plan when they are able and willing to meet the just requirements for such participation. The result is that certain products that have overwhelming majorities in favor of marketing agreements in our State are denied any benefits under this bill or any right to be even considered.

This is true of hops. Practically all the hops in the United States are produced in the three Pacific Coast States. These producers recently voted by a very large majority in favor of a marketing agreement. This act denies the hop producers any opportunity to receive the benefits of the act.

I am hoping that before this bill finally becomes a law changes will be made which will give the farmers an equal opportunity when they demonstrate sufficient approval to have the benefits of this bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute to answer a question which the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to ask.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question which I have asked a number of the speakers, but I have received a different opinion from different individuals in the House. Under this bill, H. R. 8492, is the Secretary of Agriculture permitted to levy processing taxes the same as under the A. A. A.?

Mr. JONES. He is permitted to levy processing taxes. We have made some changes in order to assure that there is no taxing power delegated. We make more certain, insofar as it is possible to do so, the exact conditions under which the processing fee will be levied. Then he is given the power to vary those taxes, and given other methods that may be used in addition.

Mr. RICH. Then the Secretary of Agriculture will have the power to regulate these taxes up or down as he may determine?

Mr. JONES. There is a provision herein which will permit him to do that under certain very restricted conditions.

Mr. RICH. Is he permitted under this bill to add any other commodities than those stipulated under the new A. A. A. amendment?

Mr. JONES. No; not so far as processing taxes are concerned.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. On page 47, it seems that refunds and credits are to be allowed in the future when the processor swears that he did not get the money from the vendee. I would like to have the gentleman explain that provision, if he will.

Mr. JONES. In an effort to recover processing fees, where there is a refund, except in case of overpayment or duplicate payment, before the processor is permitted to recover he would be required to show that he did not pass it on to the consumer.

Mr. GIFFORD. Suppose he did not pass it on?

Mr. JONES. He would be permitted to show that fact. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 12 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] 5 minutes also.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, may I join in the tribute which other members of the committee have already paid our chairman? We all appreciate the patience with which he has listened to the suggestions of the various members of the committee, the courtesy he has shown us at all times, and the leadership that he has exhibited in making this bill, I believe, the most important bill that the Committee on Agriculture has reported to the House.

Before I go into a discussion of the provisions of the bill itself, I want to take a few moments to reply to the attacks made on the processing tax this morning by the gentleman from Wisconsin and by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] on yesterday. I appreciate the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts with reference to his interest in farm prosperity, and I have no reason to doubt that at all. I note his suggestion that he and his constituents are not opposing benefit payments to the farmers, but that they do oppose making those payments from the proceeds of a processing tax. I note his suggestion also that we do away with processing taxes and make benefit payments out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. GIFFORD. Only on one commodity. Please do not forget that.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman corrects me by saying that is only on one commodity. I presume that is cotton.

That proposal is, in my opinion, both unfair and illogical. The gentleman admits by his statement that the farmers of this country are not receiving a fair price for their products and that, I submit, is the only reason why any benefit payments should be made to the farmers, because if they are receiving a fair price they are not entitled to anything further. If they are not getting a fair price it is because the consumers of those products are not paying a fair price.

The most practical way to insure that the consumers of these products will pay a fair price—at least, the most practical way that has been devised so far—is to apply the processing tax to make up the difference between the going farm price and the fair exchange value. That is what has been done in applying the processing tax. If we should follow the plan suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts and make benefit payments out of the Federal Treasury, we would in effect say to the consumers of farm products, "We are going to let you have these products for less than a fair price, less than you ought to pay for them, and we are going to tax future generations in order to give you this subsidy." That is exactly what we would do if we adopted the plan suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. HOPE. Yes; I yield for a brief question.

Mr. GIFFORD. Speaking of taking money from the General Treasury, does not your exportable feature in this measure, where you take $100,000,000 from the customs, take money out of the General Treasury?

Mr. HOPE. I understood the gentleman to say he had no objection to that.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not; but it applies just the same to the other method.

Mr. HOPE. It is used primarily, of course, as the gentleman understands, for another purpose, and I propose later to discuss that feature so far as that is concerned; but I do not want to be diverted now.

Whether the gentleman from Massachusetts agrees to it or not, the fact is the processing tax is the farmer's tariff. The prices of agricultural commodities of which we have an exportable surplus are fixed in the world market. There are times and conditions under which tariffs are effective upon these commodities. In general, however, they are largely ineffective. This means that producers of those commodities must buy on a protective market and sell on a world market. The processing tax is the one method which has been devised thus far to give producers of these commodities a price commensurate with the general price structure of the country. Every argument which can be made for a protective tariff can be made for processing taxes. The theory justifying each is the same, and I predict that in the future the two will stand or fall together. This is inevitable because the farmer, whose prices are fixed in world markets, cannot continue to buy in a protected market. Either the tariff will have to come off or a compensating benefit in the form of a processing tax will have to continue.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts and other members of my own party to the recognition of this principle, which was contained in the resolutions adopted at the recent "grass roots" Republican convention, in part as follows:

> We hold that no economic advantage of agriculture thus far attained shall be ended. The farmer is of right entitled to a fair and proportionate part of the national income, and to receive a parity price for the products of his farm in domestic markets.

And, continuing, it is stated:

> We endorse the statement of Governor Lowden in this conference that so long as we have a protective tariff for the benefit of industry we should give to agriculture corresponding benefits for that portion of the production of the soil which goes into domestic consumption.

That is exactly what the processing-tax program does. This principle has been supported by Republicans in the Middle West ever since the days of the first McNary-Haugen bill. We will continue to support it, and I do not believe that I am speaking out of turn when I say that unless the tariff-protected industries of the East are willing to afford that measure of protection to agriculture then we of the West cannot be expected to continue to support high tariffs for industrial products.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before discussing the details of this measure, I wish for a moment to say something about the agricultural situation as it exists at this time.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. RICH. In speaking of the tariff for industry and the tariff for agriculture as exemplified in the processing tax, the tariff for industry is a prohibition on the import of commodities from foreign countries. Is that applicable in the same manner to agricultural products, as was stated by the gentleman a few moments ago?

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman has a different idea of the tariff than I have if he thinks a tariff prohibits imports from other countries. The gentleman evidently means an embargo. The tariff provides for a compensating duty on products which come in from other countries, in order to equalize the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, and that in effect is what the processing tax does.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a short question?

Mr. HOPE. Just briefly; yes.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman has been speaking about this new tariff he is going to have for agriculture. What about the tariff we have always had for agriculture? From a blade of grass to the biggest steer or mule raised on a farm we have had protection. What are you talking about when you refer to another tariff? Does the gentleman want two tariffs? This is a plain question.

Mr. HOPE. All right, I will answer it in a plain way.

Mr. FOCHT. All right.

Mr. HOPE. I will say that tariffs are usually not effective as to agricultural commodities which are on an export basis, at least, not fully effective. The reason for this is that the price of these commodities is made in the world market. It is based upon the export price, and as long as we are on an exportable basis we take the world price. The only way you can give the farmer a domestic price is to do it by the method we have adopted in applying the processing tax. This, of course, does not apply to all agricultural products. On some of them, such as dairy products, where we are on an import basis, tariffs are effective in increasing price.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to allow me to clear that question with a short statement? The processing tax on wheat, for instance, would have to be immensely larger if we did not retain the tariff of 42 cents a bushel on wheat.

Mr. HOPE. It is true that during recent months——

Mr. GIFFORD. You must have that tariff of 42 cents just the same.

Mr. HOPE. Not necessarily. It is true that during recent months the tariff has been partly effective on wheat because of the fact we have had a great drought and a shortage. We have had three short wheat crops in this country; but ordinarily, when we are on an exportable basis, the price in this country is the world price less transportation charges.

Mr. GIFFORD. If you did not have the 42-cent tariff now, you would have plenty of foreign wheat coming into this country.

Mr. HOPE. If we did not have the 42-cent tariff, the processing tax would be higher at present.

Mr. GIFFORD. Very much higher.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas 5 minutes more.

Mr. HOPE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word about the agricultural situation at this time, because I believe that is important in considering what this measure is expected to do.

In the first place it has immeasurably improved as compared with 2 years ago. Some commodities, notably corn and tobacco, have reached a parity price. Others have approached it more nearly than for several years. Surpluses of cotton and wheat have been greatly reduced. The excess of meat animals has been reduced. Several causes have contributed to this—the drought, the adjustment program, the devaluation of the dollar, and commodity loans have all played a part. Some commodities have been affected by all of these factors, others by only a part of them. Aside from whatever price enhancement may have come from dollar devaluation to crops, the price of which is fixed in world market, the chief reason for the better position in which agriculture finds itself is that burdensome surpluses have been removed, and there has been a better adjustment between supply and demand. This means, therefore, that whatever improvement has been made is likely to be lost unless efforts to balance supply and demand are continued. In other words, if we should plant the same number of acres as our average from 1926 to 1932, should harvest therefrom a normal crop, and were not able to develop new markets, we would in another year—certainly 2 years—approach the same condition which existed in 1931 and 1932 as far as agricultural prices are concerned. This makes it essential that the adjustment program be continued. By that I mean that the American farmer must continue to hold his production to a point where it will not result in a buyers' market like we had during the first 3 years of the depression.

I have no patience with those who call a course of this kind a program of scarcity, with the implication that farmers are interested in creating a shortage of food supplies to the detriment of the consumer's stomach and pocketbook. It is true that after having long been the victim of a policy of this kind on the part of industry, farmers might be justified in retorting in kind, yet I do not know of a single farmer or responsible spokesman for farmers who advocates a policy of that kind. Why, today, even after the most devastating drought in our history, and with the adjustment program in effect for 2 years, we have ample supplies of all food commodities, and in some cases a much heavier carry-over than in any predepression year. Our wheat carry-over this year will be between one hundred and sixty and one hundred and seventy million bushels, whereas the average for the years 1920 to 1930 was 120,000,000 bushels. The carry-over of American cotton on August 1 will be at least 8,000,000 bales. In spite of the Government cattle purchases there are more cattle in the country now than in 1928, and yet no one ever suggested a shortage at that time. There are ample supplies of beef, pork, and dairy products. In fact, it is impossible to name any agricultural commodity in which there is an actual or potential shortage at this time. Rather than being a program of scarcity, the plan now in effect is one of plentiful supplies at fair prices. The farmer is asking for no more; the consumer is entitled to no more.

The philosophy of this measure recognizes the necessity for continuing a program of adjustment, but at the same time sets up machinery by which advantage can be taken without injuring domestic price of any export demand which may be developed. It is a fair statement, I think, to say that this bill embodies in principle the equalization fee, the export debenture, and the domestic allotment plans. There is no inconsistency in this, because the basic principle of all three is that of giving the farmer a price for that part of his product which is consumed domestically which is on a par with the price of the things he buys, with a world price for any exportable surplus. It is true that the domestic allotment plan provides for a better control of production, and to that extent is generally preferable in the existing situation. However, it is thought that conditions may make it advisable on occasion to use either or both of the other methods and they are in the bill to be used if needed.

The provision in the bill which, in effect, makes the McNary-Haugen equalization-fee plan in order is that which authorizes the use of processing taxes for the exportation of basic agricultural commodities. The export debenture plan is contained in the provision which authorizes the appropriation of 30 percent of the customs receipts each year for the purpose, among others, of financing exports.

Frankly, I am not so enthusiastic about the equalization-fee and the export-debenture features of this bill as some. I am glad they are in the bill. I hope they can be used to build up our foreign trade in agricultural products. However, these provisions in themselves will not open up any markets. The matter of price is not the fundamental reason our foreign trade in agricultural products has dropped so materially. The real reasons are our inability or disinclination to take exports from countries which would buy our products and the instability of currency which has disrupted all world trade.

Our situation now is not materially different from what it has been since we became a creditor nation during the war, except that until 1929 we loaned enough money abroad to enable importing nations to buy our surplus agricultural commodities. When the loans stopped our trade began declining and has continued to decline ever since. I think the provisions in the bill making funds available to overcome what price obstacles there may be in connection with exports of agricultural products will be helpful in special cases, but

I do not expect to see any great increase in agricultural exports until world currencies are stabilized, and until we are willing to accept imports from the countries which can use our agricultural products.

Generally speaking, the provisions of the bill may be divided into five main parts. The first deals with changes in the law affecting those basic commodities on which programs are now in effect, involving the payment of benefits to producers in connection with adjustment programs.

The second deals with the matter of orders covering certain specified commodities which cannot be included in the benefit payment plan or in which it is felt that it is necessary to supplement the benefit payment plan through the use of orders.

The third deals with the new provision authorizing the appropriation of 30 percent of the customs receipts for the development of foreign markets, together with other agricultural purposes and the use of processing taxes under certain conditions to promote the exportation of agricultural commodities.

The fourth is the provision which gives the President authority to impose compensating taxes or quotas on imports which are rendering ineffective or which materially interfere with the agricultural adjustment program.

The fifth deals with the imposition and collection of processing taxes.

I do not mean to imply that all of the provisions of this bill can be grouped under the five heads above mentioned, but these five subdivisions do embrace the more important features.

The most important provisions of the bill, as they relate to the programs involving benefit payments, are those which make this specifically an adjustment rather than a reduction program. It is not necessarily a change in policy, because the title of the original act indicates that an adjustment program was to be undertaken. However, the provisions in that act for the payment of benefits contemplated their payment only in return for crop reductions. The amendments contained in this bill provide that payments may be made for crop adjustments. Another feature contained in this part of the measure is the provision whereby benefit payments may, at the option of the producer, be made in commodities rather than in cash, specific provisions of the amendment, however, requiring that payment only be made in the commodity with respect to which the payment is being made.

Closely connected with this feature is the ever normal granary plan which authorizes the Government to acquire from the proceeds of processing taxes agricultural commodities which have been pledged as security for Government loans and to use the same in making payments in kind rather than in cash to producers who have cooperated in the program in question. It is the thought that through the use of this plan it may be possible to prevent violent fluctuations in prices due to excessively large or small crops and maintain for the benefit of consumers adequate reserves of agricultural commodities from year to year.

By reason of the decision in the Schechter case it has been felt advisable to rewrite the provisions of the original Agricultural Adjustment Act which gave the Secretary of Agriculture the right to make rental and benefit payments. The new language makes provision for findings by the Secretary upon which the determination to make rental or benefit payments may be based and specifies what the Secretary must find in order to put those payments into effect. In other words, the delegation of power to the Secretary is specifically set out and the basis which he must use in making his findings is written in the act. It is also specified that benefit payments must be terminated when the Secretary makes certain other findings in the exercise of the power conferred on him in the bill.

Of importance also is the provision to the effect that in determining parity prices in the case of all commodities for which the pre-war period is used as a basis, that account must be taken of the difference in interest payments and tax payments per acre on farm real estate between the base period and the present. It is estimated that at the present time taxes and interest payments per acre are approximately 160 percent or 170 percent of the pre-war level. Such items are an important part of the cost of farm operations and their inclusion in the matter of determining parity prices afford a much fairer basis for the same.

There are certain very important agricultural commodities upon which it is not possible to put into effect plans involving benefit payments to producers. The most important of these commodities are milk and fruits and vegetables. Under the provisions of the original Agricultural Adjustment Act, attempts have been made to handle these commodities by means of marketing agreements. In some cases these efforts have been quite successful, particularly as to some fruits and vegetables. In the case of milk the efforts have been successful only in part. As a matter of fact, the milk situation is the most aggravated in the agricultural picture today. This is particularly true in the large milksheds, every one of which seems to have a different problem to meet. The great difficulty in most cases is that the distribution of milk in these areas is under what amounts to monopolistic control and the dealers have apparently been able to force the producer to take any price which they care to pay. This has been brought out very clearly as a result of the investigation which the Federal Trade Commission has made in some of the larger milk sheds of the country. Inasmuch as the dairy industry is the largest single branch of agricultural production and includes more farmers than any other, it is important that everything possible be done to relieve the distress which now exists.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Schechter case makes it necessary to entirely rewrite those provisions of the original Agricultural Adjustment Act relating to marketing agreements and licenses in order to meet the constitutional questions raised by that decision. To this end the power of the Secretary in such matters is limited to the power of the Federal Government over interstate commerce as stated by the Court in the Schechter and similar cases. The transactions affected are by the terms of the bill confined to agricultural commodities or products thereof in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, or which directly burdens, obstructs, or affects interstate or foreign commerce. Likewise, in conformity with the decision, the powers which are granted the Secretary are specifically set out in the bill itself. Also, in order to more nearly express the character of the regulations made by the Secretary, they are in this measure called "orders" instead of licenses. I know no one who is familiar with the nature of these regulations who will not agree that this is a more accurate term. The commodities embraced in the marketing agreements and orders section are limited to the following, and with the exception of naval stores, extend to the products thereof: Milk, fruits—including pecans and walnuts, but not including apples and not including fruits for canning—tobacco, vegetables—including soybeans but not including vegetables for canning—and naval stores. As to milk and its products, there are certain specific provisions set out which the Secretary may include in his orders and he is given no authority to include provisions other than those set out. As to the other commodities mentioned, the Secretary is specifically limited by the legislation as to the nature of the orders which may be made. It is further provided that orders may not be issued except under certain conditions, and in the case of the so-called "imposed orders" the Secretary must find that the orders are approved or favored by at least two-thirds of the producers of the commodity in the area affected. Furthermore, no producer as such can be made subject to an order and no retailer, excepting retailers of milk and its products.

FUNDS FOR ENCOURAGING EXPORTS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Reference has already been made to the provisions contained in the bill setting aside 30 percent of the customs receipts each year to be used among other things to bring about the exportation of agricultural commodities. In this connection there should also be mentioned the provision whereby the proceeds of processing taxes may be used for the same purpose. In addition to encouraging the exportation of major agricultural commodities, the proceeds of the 30-percent fund may be used to encourage the domestic consumption of such commodities, for the purchase or lease of submarginal and grazing land, and to finance adjustments in the quantity planted or produced for market of agricultural commodities. It is specifically provided, however, that funds shall not be used for the last two purposes unless the Secretary finds that it is not necessary to spend such funds in assisting the exportation of major agricultural commodities or encouraging the domestic consumption of such commodities. It is felt that this provision, together with that which makes it possible to use processing-tax funds for the same purpose, affords ample opportunity to encourage and stimulate exports of agricultural products, so far as the same may be done through removing price differentials.

Under existing conditions, especially with many countries operating under depreciated currencies, it is quite possible for the agricultural program to be seriously affected by imports. For this reason a provision has been placed in the bill by which the President is given power to order an investigation by the Tariff Commission when he has reason to believe that articles are being imported, or are likely to be imported, under such conditions and in quantities to render ineffective or materially interfere with the operation of any program under the Adjustment Act. If, as a result of this investigation, it is found that the importation of the articles in question is having an adverse effect upon an agricultural program, it is within the power of the President to impose compensating taxes or place a quota upon the importation of the articles in question. It is believed that this provision will be very helpful in meeting any emergency which may suddenly arise with respect to imports.

TAX PROVISION

This bill makes some very important changes in the provisions for processing taxes. One of the most important is that which provides in the case of all commodities upon which the tax is now in effect, except rice, the tax in effect on June 1, 1935, shall remain in effect until December 31, 1937, and in the case of rice the June 1 rate shall remain in effect until July 31, 1936. This express fixing of the rates by Congress does away with any objection which might be raised on constitutional grounds as to the right of the Secretary to fix the amount of the tax. In order to further meet any objection which might be raised on that ground, it is set out in the bill that the Secretary must make certain findings before any change can be put into effect increasing, decreasing, or removing the tax. Under certain conditions, upon making these findings, the Secretary may vary the rate of tax fixed by this act prior to December 31, 1937, and on and after that time he is authorized to impose new rates of taxes based upon the findings which he makes under the authority given him by this act.

Another important provision is that which states that in determining the rate of the processing tax the Secretary must take into consideration the fact that a portion of the goods normally subject to tax is tax exempt because they are used for charitable distribution or for State institutions. In determining the rate of tax, therefore, the Secretary is instructed to take this fact into consideration and increase the tax in an amount which will make up this deficiency in revenue, such increase, however, being limited to not more than 20 percent.

In the event that any rate of tax fixed by the Secretary under the provisions of this bill should be held to be invalid, the rates of tax which are specifically fixed in the bill are to become effective at once.

Another important provision is that which prohibits the bringing of suits for refunds or credits of any tax heretofore paid. This provision, however, does not apply to certain classes of refunds set out in the act. What is intended, of course, is to prevent the recovery of any tax paid on the ground that the tax is illegal. In the case of taxes of this kind such a provision is entirely justified, because of the fact that the taxes in question have all been passed on to the consumer and the party who nominally made the payment would not be the party in interest in any action to recover. The bill also contains a provision prohibiting refunds or credits on taxes accruing in the future unless the claimant is able to prove that he has neither passed the tax on, passed it back to the producer, nor that the person actually bearing it has consented in writing to the refund. This bill is one of the most important measures affecting agriculture ever to come before the House. It has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Agriculture after many weeks of careful study. In its present form it is a product of the deliberations of all of the members of the committee and represents a sincere effort to work out a measure which will meet the agricultural problems of today so far as this can be done by legislation. It contains the fruit of the suggestions made by those in charge of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration after 2 years' experience in administering the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It embodies many suggestions made by farmers and farm organizations. It amends and perfects the Agricultural Adjustment Act in the particulars in which experience has shown it to be deficient, and finally it attempts to meet the constitutional questions raised by recent decisions by the Supreme Court. In its present form it is, in the opinion of the committee, in harmony with those decisions. This bill will not meet with the approval of those who are opposed to Government assistance to agriculture. It will not be favored by those who believe in tariff protection for industry but are opposed to compensating benefits to agriculture. It will be opposed by that class of processors of agricultural commodities who are in favor of buying farm commodities as cheaply as possible and selling them at as high prices as the consumer will pay.

The bill is in entire harmony with the present Agricultural Adjustment Act and represents a logical extension of the act looking toward a more permanent program for agriculture. It is in harmony with the efforts for agricultural equality which have been made in the agricultural sections of the country ever since the World War from the original McNary-Haugen bill to the present time. It is in entire harmony with the resolutions relating to agriculture which were adopted at the recent meeting of middle western Republicans at Springfield, Ill. So far as I know, no national farm organization is opposed to the bill, and almost all of them have affirmatively gone on record as favoring it. In my opinion it comes more nearly having the united support of the agricultural interests of the country than any measure ever before Congress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE].

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, in matters of agriculture if the Republican Members of the House would follow the able leadership of men like the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MARSHALL], they would have a safe agricultural program.

Likewise, if they would follow the leadership of the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas, Mr. MARVIN JONES, they would pass legislation that is beneficial to agriculture. Mr. JONES and Mr. HOPE represent agricultural districts containing farms and ranches larger than some of the counties of New England.

I wish now to answer the arguments advanced in yesterday's debate by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BEAM].

He used indirection and innuendo. The facts and figures that he submitted no doubt are correct, but the whole effect of his speech was to imply that the farmers had received much greater benefits at the hands of the Government than they have, and not only to imply but to state that the benefits to agriculture have been at the expense of business. Let me give you the gentleman's words as found in the RECORD, on page 9474, of June 17, 1935, where he said:

> I sometimes wonder, "Are we saddling upon the business of the Nation too great a load and too heavy an obligation?"

Then he enumerated the different bills that have been proposed for agricultural relief. Now, mark you, these bills have merely been proposed, have not become law, but he enumerates them, and totals up the amounts in the respective bills, leaving the impression that the farmer is the recipient of this grand total of proposed appropriations.

Then, further, he totals up the bills, including the amounts of money that have been authorized to be appropriated for loans to the farmers on their grain, livestock, and land, as though that, too, would be "saddled upon the business of the Nation."

In other words, the gentleman has said to the House that if the farmer had all the money that has been proposed for farm relief, he would have all the money that has been proposed for farm relief, if all of this proposed legislation were passed.

In other words, if he had some ham, he would have ham and eggs, if he had some eggs.

That is what I mean by the argument of indirection and innuendo. If I ask you how far it is from here to New York City and you tell me that a dog's hind leg is crooked, what you say is absolutely true, but it has nothing to do with the question asked.

What has been proposed for farm relief has very little to do with what the farmer is actually receiving.

The gentleman seems to have stayed within the facts, but he has presented them in such a manner as to give an implied meaning that does not square with the true situation.

For instance, it is like the man who himself would not hurt the dog, but he pushed the dog out of doors and yelled "Mad dog!" The result was the same as though the man himself had killed the dog in the first instance. He placed the dog in such a bad light before the people that they administered the death sentence.

Mr. BEAM would place facts before this House in such a manner as to have you administer a death sentence to the only relief that seems available at the present time for agriculture.

The gentleman has told you how much has been proposed—not appropriated, mark you—for the relief of agriculture, with the intention of leaving you under the impression that the farmer has been amply cared for at the expense of business, and I suppose the gentleman has in mind big business, because the Chicago stockyards are in his district.

The gentleman proceeds on the same line of reasoning that the man would who said one morning when he met his friend, "I have just saved $50,000."

His friend inquired how, and he said, "General Motors went down $1 a share on the stock market, and I did not have 50,000 shares."

The gentleman from Illinois has listed the different appropriations for loans to the farmers and in his arguments has asked, "Are we not saddling upon the business of the Nation too great a load and too heavy an obligation?" clearly implying that the money loaned to the farmer will have to be paid back by the business man.

Now let us take up some of these loans and see for ourselves who will pay them, and whether or not they constitute burdens that will be "saddled upon the business of the Nation."

When the corn farmers were selling corn at the ruinous price of 10 cents a bushel, the Government stepped in and loaned these farmers 45 cents a bushel on that corn in sealed cribs. These loans bore interest at the rate of, I believe it was 6 percent.

Corn advanced in price to 90 cents a bushel; it advanced to just twice the amount the Government had loaned on it. When that corn was sold, not only the principal but the interest was paid. The Government actually made money on that loan and saved the farmers of the Corn Belt $160,000,000 that would otherwise have gone to the grain speculators on the grain exchange.

Now those loans have already been paid back with interest or else are secured by corn that is worth twice the amount of the loan. Therefore, it will not be necessary to "saddle that burden upon the business of the Nation."

Then again, when the livestock industry was flat on its back, the Government came to the rescue. I have some cattle, I secured a Government loan at a time when it was difficult to get a bid on the cows, and those that sold brought from $4 to $12 a head, and had it not been for the Government loans, most of the livestock men would have been forced to throw their livestock upon the market, which would have forced the price still further down the scale.

That Government loan saved me from losing my herd. I have already paid back half the amount of the loan plus the interest due, from the increase of the herd, and the remaining cattle are now worth three to four times more than they were when the loan was made.

Would not you consider that pretty good security? The Government saved the livestock industry and actually made money by these loans. That money will not have to be raised by taxation, and thus "saddle a burden on the business of the Nation."

Then again, our farmers were being foreclosed on their farms when the Government stepped in and made available Government loans secured by the farms. Before a farmer could get one of these loans an appraiser came out and appraised his land. Then a second appraiser came out and checked the first one. The farmer and his wife both signed a first-mortgage lien on that farm to the Government. That loan bears 5-percent interest. Before a clear title can be given to that property it will be necessary to pay not only the principal but the interest.

These loans were all made at about two-thirds of the market value of the farm, which certainly should be a low enough valuation to make them a good loan.

Those loans are well secured. The great loan companies and the life-insurance companies have always considered farm mortgages as the best form of investment. And the money loaned on these farms will not become a "burden saddled upon business."

In other words, my friends, if grain that represents the bread which we eat, if the livestock that represents the meat that we eat, if the fertile farm acres that represent the productive power of the Nation, if the farmer's name on these loans backed by his character, if all of this does not represent good security, then we do not have any in the United States.

Therefore, I submit that Government loans are not Government gifts, and the gentleman has erroneously implied that these constitute a burden that will be saddled upon the business interest in the United States.

Then again, the gentleman from Illinois presented in another argument an unfair comparison. Quoting page 9474 of the RECORD of June 17, 1935, the gentleman said:

> Now let us see what agriculture has paid in taxes. For the years 1924 to 1928, mineral producers paid almost six times as much as farmers in Federal taxes. * * *

Now, I believe every Member of this House will recognize the unfairness of that comparison, because farmers pay their taxes on real property located in the local community, and as a matter of fact, the money from their taxes goes to the building of roads, running schools, and operating the local government, and very little of the farmers' tax goes into the Federal Treasury, whereas, because of the very nature of the business itself, the mineral industry naturally pays considerable Federal taxes.

Again may I call your attention to the gentleman's style of argument. It is obviously an injustice to compare the Federal taxes of the farmer to those of the mineral industry, but would the gentleman say that the mineral industry or any other business pays as much tax, State and local, in proportion to its ability to pay as does the farmer?

If the mineral industry and the packing industry and all the other industries paid as much taxes in proportion to the ability to pay as the farmer does, there would be little need to worry about revenue, because we would have an abundance.

I have seen in some of the farm journals the statement that the land in the United States represents only 40 percent of the Nation's wealth, but that it bears 80 percent of the Nation's tax load.

Now, if that statement is true, the farmer, representing only 40 percent of the Nation's wealth, is carying 80 percent of the tax load, and I have in mind local and State as well as Federal taxes.

Therefore, the gentleman, by arguing to you that the farmer is not bearing his share of the tax load is manifestly unfair.

I can give the gentleman a better comparison than that. Why did he not compare the farmer's income taxes with the income taxes of the business world. Very few, if any, farmers have enough income to pay income tax; therefore the comparison is unfair, because the farmer pays a heavy property tax. All through the gentleman's arguments are those dangerous tricks of illogical comparison. For instance, to show you how unjust such tricks can be, suppose I tell you that the average income of myself and Henry Ford is $10,000,000, it certainly would be erroneous for you to conclude, therefore, that my income was $5,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, I now wish to consider the arguments against the processing tax as advanced by the gentleman from Massachusetts: Where did this depression begin? I feel that every Member of Congress is interested in improving conditions in the United States and, as has already been stated in this debate, it is necessary for us to see the picture as a whole and not merely look at one section of the United States, or at one class of people. If the Nation is to be prosperous, then all wholesome business must be guarded.

But I submit that this depression began when the farmer lost his buying power. He stopped buying, the merchant stopped selling, the factory wheels stopped turning, and wage earners started hitch-hiking.

Now, what caused the farmer to lose his buying power? It was because of the great difference between what he had to sell and what he had to buy. He had to sell on a world market and buy on a protected market. The process that bled him white was so gradual that it went unnoticed, but the drain continued. This difference was made possible because of the high protective tariff for the benefit of industry.

When our Nation was young, it was argued then, and with good logic, that if we were to become a great Nation and have our own industries, it would be necessary to protect our young industries from the competition of older countries by a protective tariff, and with the full belief that as soon as these industries were developed, that tariff would be reduced materially, if not removed entirely, but just the contrary happened. The higher the tariff wall, the stronger grew industry. The stronger industry became, the higher went the tariff, and for 150 years an indirect subsidy, in the form of a tariff, has been laid upon all of the consumers for the special benefit of one class, the manufacturing class.

Therefore, it comes with poor grace from the gentleman from New England to oppose this processing tax on the grounds that it is an indirect subsidy laid upon all consumers for the special benefit of the agricultural class. Because this is a farmer's tariff.

In past years the farmer has offset this handicap by frugal living and by extra long hours of labor. It has been somewhat offset, too, because the farmer has found a ready market for most of his products. But as the purchasing power of his products gradually diminished he stretched out his arm and produced more in order to make up the difference in purchasing power. But, finally the tariff handicap overtook him. What he bought cost more, and what he sold brought less. No matter how fast his herds increased, they could not keep pace with the ever-widening gulf between what he had to sell and what he had to buy, until finally his buying power was completely destroyed.

May I give one incident to prove what I say. A farmer in my district took 127 cowhides to Oklahoma City and sold them. He took all the money he got from 127 cowhides and went to buy one set of tug harness. It took all of the money he got from 127 hides and $9 additional cash to buy the one set of tug harness.

Therefore, when there is that much difference between what the farmer sells and what he buys, his buying power has been destroyed, so the farmer stopped buying. He had to.

We have heard the argument to let the law of supply and demand operate. We are perfectly willing for the law of supply and demand to operate providing it operates on the manufacturer as well as the farmer, but heretofore the law of supply and demand has been artificially controlled as applied to the manufacturer and allowed to operate freely as applied to the farmer. Now we are at the crossroads. We must go one of two ways. We must either let the law of supply and demand operate naturally as applied to both, or artificially control it as applied to both.

I agree with the gentleman from New England that we should have a high standard of living in the United States and that to remove all tariff protection would be a mistake, because it would place our laborers in competition with the cheap labor from foreign countries, but likewise, unless we also give the farmers protection, they are in competition with the Hindus of India, the Chinese of Tibet, the Arabians of Egypt, the Hottentots of Algeria, and the peons of Mexico.

Now, therefore, gentlemen, since this depression began with the break-down of the farmer's purchasing power, I believe we should begin recovery by restoring that purchasing power.

The difference between the farmer's condition before the enactment of the A. A. A. and the present is the difference between 4-cent cotton and 12-cent cotton, the difference between 24-cent wheat—I sold wheat from my ranch at 24 cents—and 90-cent wheat.

The farmer's purchasing power is gradually being restored. When it is sufficiently restored, he will begin buying the things that he needs—farm machinery, paint, lumber, barbed wire, metal roofing, and the long list of things needed on the farm.

When they begin buying again, the merchants will begin selling; when the merchants begin selling, the factory wheels start turning. When the factory wheels start turning, the laborers will be employed. Then we will be on the road to permanent recovery.

Let me say to the gentleman from New England, just as the tariff is here to stay, so also is the processing tax here to stay. I believe it possible for every industry to pay what it costs the producers of raw products a fair price for those raw products, and still sell their finished commodity at a reasonable profit.

If we are to be a great and prosperous Nation, we must bring about conditions where the herdsman's call can be heard as well as the turmoil of the stock exchange, where the whistle of the plowboy can be heard as well as the hum of the factory wheel. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) the first sentence of subsection (1) of section 2 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the first word and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Through the exercise of the powers conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture under this title, to", and by inserting before the period at the end thereof a semicolon and the following: "and, in the case of all commodities for which the base period is the pre-war period, August 1909 to July 1914, will also reflect current interest payments per acre on farm indebtedness secured by real estate and tax payments per acre on farm real estate, as contrasted with such interest payments and tax payments during the base period."

(b) Section 2 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by striking out subsections (2) and (3) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) To protect the interest of the consumer by (a) approaching the level of prices which it is declared to be the policy of Congress to establish in subsection (1) of this section by gradual correction of the current level at as rapid a rate as the Secretary of Agriculture deems to be in the public interest and feasible in view of the current consumptive demand in domestic and foreign markets, and (b) authorizing no action under this title which has for its purpose the maintenance of prices to farmers above the level which it is declared to be the policy of Congress to establish in subsection (1) of this section."

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that we are following the advice of our good Speaker a little too explicitly. The Speaker asked yesterday in some interesting remarks which he made, that haste should be made in legislation. The majority and the Committee on Agriculture bring in a complicated bill of over 50 pages one morning, start general debate on it that day and expect to pass it the next day. That is making haste with a vengeance. I, for one, think we should protest against that type of legislation. It is not my opinion that the Speaker expects that sort of haste. There are too many complicated questions in this bill to take it up in such a manner as that.

Among others of the complicated features is the continuation of the processing tax. I introduced, almost at the beginning of this session of Congress, a measure to repeal the processing tax. So far I have been unable to secure even so much as a hearing upon that measure. It is not a tax, as I see it, and as the word is defined, but if there is one iniquitous form of legislation it is the so-called "processing tax", where one group of people is assessed for the benefit of another, but not for the Federal Treasury. In my judgment, it is as iniquitous as anything the Democratic Party has put on the statute books during its power, and absolutely unfair to a large section of this country.

Further than that, it is the first time, to my knowledge, that any definite effort has been made to tax food and clothing. Some years ago we tried to pass the so-called "manufacturers' excise tax", carrying a tax equitably to all classes of people at moderate rates, and instead of accepting such a measure as that, we are today confronted with a continuation of this type of taxation. I am astonished that the majority would offer legislation of this type.

There is included in this bill, I understand, additions to the processing tax. For instance, there are two or three pages which, as I casually glance through the bill, endeavor to legalize what the Supreme Court has declared to be unconstitutional. Now, if the Democratic majority intend to try to get away with that type of legislation, they should let people know about it for more than 24 hours in advance; but it is fair to assume that the gag is again at work.

Another outstanding objection to this measure, in my mind, is the fact that it takes 30 percent, or about $125,000,000, of revenue collected at the customhouse and pass it out to the so-called "equalization" of agricultural products. I represent, in large measure, an agricultural section, but we do not stand for that kind of legislation.

I simply want to further call attention to the iniquity of the settlement of the processing tax, when one concern in my district last year paid $1,000,000 in processing taxes and another concern paid $250,000, without the slightest benefit to anybody, so far as I can learn, and without being able to pass a cent of it on to the consumer.

Now, let us not run away with the idea that legislation for one section of this country as against another is of general benefit. We have heard nothing of late but complaints about New England. For heaven's sake, how is the rest of the country going to live if you cannot earn an honest livelihood in the New England or northeast section of this country? It is ridiculous to say that we have sufficient money in our area to support all the rest of the country under these unfair and iniquitous methods of taxation. Let us get back to the old methods of living under the Constitution, and not try by legislation of this kind to offset legal constitutional decisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has expired.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] says that he protests that we are making too much haste. We have a good and righteous thing to do, and experience teaches us that the sooner we do a good and righteous thing, the better it is.

The gentleman speaks of the processing tax as being iniquitous. If it be iniquitous, we learned our lesson, and we got our example from the high protection tariff interests whom the gentleman so ably speaks for and represents in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that the first protective tariff came from Henry Clay and John Calhoun, one from Kentucky and the other from South Carolina, and at that time New England was the free-trade section of the country?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That may be true, but I will say to the gentleman that the father of the protective tariff in this country was Alexander Hamilton. We find that Alexander Hamilton said that there should be a protective tariff, but that there should also be a bounty or compensating benefit to the farmer. That has been the fundamental trouble in this country. We have gone on all the while raising higher and higher tariffs for the industries and the manufacturing interests of this country, and at the same time have refused to do one thing for the farmers.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes, if the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The Democratic Party has been in control of this Congress for 5 years. It has been in control of the Nation for 3 years. It is talking constantly of high tariffs, but what have you done about it?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. We are working on the tariff, and we have done this: We have given to the farmers of America the A. A. A. We have given them equality of opportunity in this land. That is what we have done.

The gentleman knows that if the farmers of the country had continued to follow the Republican Party bare feet and shirttails would be their uniform today. [Laughter.] That has been the trouble through the years, we have not given the farmers that equality of opportunity to which they were justly entitled and which is so necessary for the general welfare and the very life of the country. That is exactly what the A. A. A. Act does and what these amendments propose to do; and in giving to the farmer equality of opportunity we do not rob some other section, we do not rob some other group, or some other class. The records show, Mr. Chairman, that the greatest increase in department store purchases, in general merchandise, in insurance sales, and automobile sales last year was in the sections of the country where the A. A. A. farm program was operating. The goods and articles purchased from the department stores, the general merchandise and the other things, are manufactured by the industries of America, and when you make it possible for our farmers to buy those things, then you make it possible for these industries to prosper. One of the major contributing causes of the depression was the fact that under Republican tariffs the farmers were exploited and robbed to the point that their purchasing power was destroyed.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. RICH. In reference to the statement made by the gentleman that we did not do anything for the farmer, does not the gentleman believe——

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield for that. The gentleman knows his party has not done anything for the farmer.

Mr. RICH. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Then, ask the question.

Mr. RICH. Does not the gentleman think we ought to have a tariff on every commodity the farmer grows so that competitive commodities cannot be imported into the country?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No, of course, I do not think there ought to be a tariff on every commodity the farmer grows. We have got to sell our products in the markets of the world, and to preserve those markets we cannot follow a policy of exclusion. Furthermore, the Republican Party placed a tariff on wheat and it did the farmer no good. It would be absurd to talk about a tariff on cotton where over 50 percent of the crop must be exported.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that the people of this country, whether they live on farms or in cities, ought to be thankful for this A. A. A. program, because we are taking care of the economic mud sill of the Nation in providing this program.

I join in what has been said in tribute to the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and the members of that committee, and I also want to pay my tribute to Henry Wallace, Rex Tugwell, and Chester Davis. They have been the backfield of this program, they have played ball, they have carried the ball to touchdown after touchdown [applause]; and if we will go forward with this program we shall not only bring the American farmer into a happier and better day but we shall lead the entire Nation into a brighter and more abundant day. [Applause.]

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'MALLEY: Strike out the quotation marks and the period in line 18, page 2, and add thereto the following language: "(c) And by setting a maximum consumer price exceeding which certain designated commodities may not be sold."

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, section 1 as amended——

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, if I heard the amendment correctly——

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I submit the gentleman's point of order comes too late. The Chair had already recognized me, and I was proceeding with my argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order comes too late. The gentleman had offered his amendment and been recognized and was proceeding with his discussion.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of section 2, according to its language, is to protect the interests of the consumer. The authority given the Secretary of Agriculture in section 2 supposedly is authority for the protection of the interests of the consumer, but insofar as section 2 goes it is only a group of nice words; it does not mean anything.

We have delegated enough authority to the Secretary of Agriculture in the past few years to make him rank with the former Czars of the Russias. Why not, then, give him additional authority to protect the interests of the consumer against rising prices; and one of the ways in which we can give the Secretary of Agriculture authority to check prices when they get out of bounds is to add these few words to this section that I propose. My amendment would make the section actually effective by giving the Secretary of Agriculture authority to establish a maximum price which may be charged the consumers upon the commodities designated in the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

The farmers of the country represent 30,000,000 consumers, but the residents of the cities of this country represent equally as many, if not more, consumers, and they ought to have some protection from the costs and from the results of this Agricultural Adjustment Act. While we are giving authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to designate the prices that shall be paid the farmers, let us also give him some authority to control the prices which the consumers of this country have to pay for the necessities of life, the things they eat and wear, which they must buy, whether they are on relief or receiving the average meager income paid to the great mass of workers.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, under the decision of the Supreme Court if an attempt is made to fix prices by legislation a yardstick would have to be laid down, and this is not done by this amendment.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. No; I am sorry I cannot yield.

In the second place it is very doubtful, even if you did say that you could fix a particular price, that it would be constitutional, because it is not limited in its application to commodities in interstate commerce.

In the third place, the gentleman said he represents a city district and is not interested in the farmers' prices. Therefore, for all of the three reasons cited I ask that the amendment be defeated.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the O'Malley amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MICHENER: Page 1, line 3, after the word "that", strike out the remainder of the section and insert in lieu thereof the following: "section 2 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress—

"'(1) Through the exercise of the powers conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture under this title, to establish and maintain such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities, and such marketing conditions therefor, as will reestablish prices to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy, equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period; and, in the case of all commodities for which the base period is the pre-war period, August 1909 to July 1914, will also reflect current interest payments per acre on farm indebtedness secured by real estate and tax payments per acre on farm real estate, as contrasted with such interest payments, and tax payments during the base period. The base period in the case of all agricultural commodities except tobacco shall be the pre-war period, August 1909–July 1914. In the case of tobacco, the base period shall be the post-war period, August 1919–July 1929.

"'(2) To protect the interest of the consumer by (a) approaching the level of prices which it is declared to be the policy of Congress to establish a subsection (1) of this section by gradual correction of the current level at as rapid a rate as the Secretary of Agriculture deems to be in the public interest and feasible in view of the current consumptive demand in domestic and foreign markets, and (b) authorizing no action under this title which has for its purpose the maintenance of prices to farmers above the level which it is declared to be the policy of Congress to establish in subsection (1) of this section.'"

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be considered as scolding the members of committees about the form of bills. This amendment in no way changes what the committee seeks to accomplish. Section 1 of the bill furnishes the mechanics and lays down a formula whereby existing law is to be amended. The amendment which I present is the result accomplished if the directions as set forth in section 1 of the bill are carried out. In short, it is the accomplishment, and not the narration, of the operation which the Committee seeks to perform on section 2 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

No one will contend that section 1 of this bill as drafted is properly drafted. Such draftsmanship would be unworthy of the crudest State legislature or county board of supervisors in the country. Imagine a court wanting to ascertain what the law was and being confronted with a statute which directed him to strike out a semicolon, insert a comma, strike out certain language and insert other language in lieu thereof; and this in the shape of an amendment to the original statute. It would be necessary for him to call a stenographer and to redraft the statute before he could tell what he was asked to rule upon. If we adopt this bill as drafted, the court will be obliged to do that very thing.

We have a legislative counsel, or drafting service, in which we have taken much pride in the past, and on whom we have been wont to rely. Mr. O'Brien, of that service, is in attendance upon the committee, and I have talked with him about this form of draftsmanship. These men are experts and the committee should yield to their judgment. It does not require an expert to amend by "striking out" and "inserting" only. There is no justification or excuse for such slovenly, loose, vague, and uncertain language as is found in this bill.

No excuse is given or can be given other than that it is not desired to be specific, because there might be some omission, or that the attention of the House might be called to existing law, which upon consideration might be further objected to, or perchance a properly drafted statute might require a little more printing. Surely we should not economize in printing at the expense of properly worded legislation.

Someone has suggested to me that the compiler of the statutes could figure this out and that the law-book companies will prepare proper compilations by assembling the statutes and working out the formulae given by the Congress. We all know these compilers' editions are not authority in court. The statutes are what count, and each statute must stand on its own bottom. Congress should make the statutes intelligible and not rely upon fallible compilers.

I call your attention to the report of the committee filed in this case with special reference to that part complying with the Ramseyer rule. The Ramseyer rule requires three things: First, the printing in roman type of the existing law sought to be altered; second, the inclusion within brackets of that part of the existing law to be amended; third, the printing in italics of the new matter added to the section. We all realize the value of this printing. Now, if you take section 2 as presented in the committee report under the Ramseyer rule and strike out everything between the brackets, which, as stated above, is the part of the old law eliminated, and reenact the remainder of the section, you will have a complete statement of the section as amended. This is good draftsmanship, is clear, concise, and tells the whole story. This is all that my amendment seeks to accomplish. It in no way changes the intention of the committee in reference to the changes in the section.

I realize that this amendment, regardless of its merit, cannot be adopted without the approval of the chairman of the committee. I am sure that the chairman of the committee will not deny that this amendment is proper. If this amendment is adopted, then I shall offer similar amendments to each succeeding section of this bill, and when the bill leaves the House we will all know just what we have enacted, and those called upon to obey the law will be able to read and to understand without inserting, striking out, and interpreting. Of course, if this amendment is not adopted, I shall not take the time of the House and the space in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in presenting the other perfecting amendments.

Under the privilege granted I want to explain the action which I shall take on this bill. I am not in favor of the plowing-under policies of the A. A. A. I realize that something must be done, if possible, to make the tariff effective for agriculture. I think that during my time in Congress I have always voted for every reasonable proposal that might aid the farmer. I voted for the McNary-Haugen bill. I voted for the Farm Board. I voted for the so-called "allotment plan" in the Seventy-second Congress. I have been ready to vote for the debenture plan. This was because no better plan was suggested, and I have felt for many years that the farmers' condition was such that some relief must be given; that nothing was certain and that a trial was necessary.

Before the Schechter decision on the N. R. A. the National Grange, the Farm Bureau, and the Milk Producers' Association from my State called upon the Michigan delegation, urging the enactment of the amendments then proposed to the A. A. A. Since that time the N. R. A. decision has, in my judgment, determined that much of the A. A. A. and the proposed amendments, including the license feature, are unconstitutional. I have not had any endorsement for the pending amendments from anyone, with the exception of the Washington representative of the Milk Producers' Association.

It is true that the existing amendments attempt to circumvent the constitutional objections set forth in the N. R. A. decision, but I do not believe that this has been accomplished. We may change the "licenses" to "orders", but it takes more than a change in name to make the change real and effective.

I realize that there is some logic in the suggestion that this is all an experiment and that the committee has attempted to include within the four corners of the present bill provisions resembling the McNary-Haugen bill and the debenture plan. Some of the suggestions in this bill are admirable, but, taken as a whole, with the inclusion of the processing taxes and the continued regimentation of agriculture, the bill is unpalatable to one who believes that the farmer should be permitted to go to bed when he gets ready, to arise at his discretion, to plant, to sow, to reap, and to sell as his good judgment dictates. We must have cooperation, but we must not have bureaucratic dictatorship.

A large percentage of my constituents are farmers. Their ancestors have lived on and from the soil. Their children have been educated. Their homes have been improved—and all this without dictation from some agent sent out by the Federal Government to control their everyday going and coming. Our people just cannot get used to this kind of thing, and I am not going to be a party to placing a penalty on initiative, industry, and thrift. There is too much artificiality in everything we do nowadays. Let us get back and be more real.

We all know that it is the surplus crop that is causing the trouble, and I am ready to attempt the principles of the equalization fee, the embargo, or any other sound principle that will make the tariff effective for agriculture. I am not going to add encouragement to legislation and practices that tax the consumer to pay the farmer not to produce, and, at the same time, put the American producer of what is left out of business by permitting foreign importations of agricultural commodities.

A number of the members of the Agriculture Committee will give facts and figures during this debate showing the quantities of farm productions imported since the A. A. A. has been in effect. It is not only interesting but it is depressing. Let us stop this thing, rather than continue the policies of the A. A. A.

I shall vote against these amendments, and in so doing believe that I am voting for the best interests of the real farmers in America. The farmer does not ask for a subsidy, all he wants is the cost of production and a reasonable profit. He must be placed on a parity with other industry. He does not want to destroy the things other people need. Make it possible for him to handle the accumulated indebtedness of the years when he was not given equal opportunity with others and he will ask no more.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, according to the gentleman's statement, it makes no difference in legal effect if we adopt the additional language which he suggests, and that would make necessary the recopying of both acts which are referred to in this measure. So far as practical life is concerned, I do not think it would be of any additional help, except it would cost more money for reprinting. If we recopied all of the laws that are amended in this House, there might not be anything for the gentleman's Committee on Revision of the Laws to do, and I do not want to take that job away from him.

May I say that the country lawyer relies on the compilation of the statutes, and that is what is presented in court. Of course, if introduced in evidence, a certified copy of the measure must be produced. We have complied literally with the orders of this House under the Ramseyer rule. In back of the committee report is shown each section amended, with the changes therein. That is the customery procedure which is followed in this House in connection with practically all bills.

This bill has a great many technical provisions in it, but has been carefully drawn and gone over. If we undertook to rewrite each paragraph of the bill here on the floor of the House we would be in utter confusion before we got through. At the appropriate time, if the gentleman wants to redraft this entire bill setting out each provision and have it checked and rechecked, I do not object to his having unanimous consent to suggest the changes and have it printed in that way when we are through, but let that be done as a separate proposition. We have complied with the procedure established by the House, and unless the House sees fit to change the procedure we do not feel at liberty to depart from it.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. I may say to the gentleman that so far as the procedure of the House is concerned, such procedure has not been followed.

Mr. JONES. It has been followed in most cases.

Mr. MICHENER. Just recently we have been following that procedure, and it seems to me that a statute should be so plain that anyone could read it and know what it means without having to refer to some other statute and then superimpose the amendments on the other statute before anyone can tell just what is the law.

Mr. JONES. I think this is plain.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Section 8 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by striking out everything preceding subsection (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe that:

"(a) The current average farm price for any basic agricultural commodity is less than, or is likely during the current or next succeeding marketing year for such commodity to be less than, the fair exchange value thereof; and

"(b) The conditions of and factors relating to the production, marketing, and consumption of such commodity are such that the exercise of any one or more of the powers conferred upon the Secretary under subsections (2) and (3) of this section would tend to effectuate the declared policy of this title, and that the exercise of any one or more of such powers would be administratively practicable;

he shall cause an immediate investigation to be made to determine such facts. If, upon the basis of such investigation, the Secretary finds the existence of such facts, he shall exercise such one or more of the powers conferred upon him under subsections (2) and (3) of this section as he finds, upon the basis of such investigation, administratively practicable and best calculated to effectuate the declared policy of this title.

"(2) Subject to the provisions of subsection (1) of this section, the Secretary of Agriculture shall provide, through agreements with producers or by other voluntary methods—

"(a) For such adjustment in the acreage or in the production for market, or both, of any basic agricultural commodity, as he finds, upon the basis of the investigation made pursuant to subsection (1) of this section, will tend to effectuate the declared policy of this title, and to make such adjustment program practicable to operate and administer; and

"(b) For rental or benefit payments in connection with such agreements or methods in such amounts as he finds, upon the basis of such investigation, to be fair and reasonable and best calculated to effectuate the declared policy of this title and to make such program practicable to operate and administer, to be paid out of any moneys available for such payments or to be made in quantities of one or more basic agricultural commodities acquired by the Secretary pursuant to this title.

"(4) Subject to the provisions of subsection (1) of this section, the Secretary of Agriculture shall make payments, out of any moneys available for such payments, in such amounts as he finds, upon the basis of the investigation made pursuant to subsection (1) of this section, to be fair and reasonable and best calculated to effectuate the declared policy of this title:

"(a) To remove from the normal channels of trade and commerce quantities of any basic agricultural commodity or product thereof;

"(b) To expand domestic or foreign markets for any basic agricultural commodity or product thereof;

"(c) In connection with the production of that part of any basic agricultural commodity which is required for domestic consumption.

"(4) Whenever, during a period during which any of the powers conferred in subsection (2) or (3) is being exercised, the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe that, with respect to any basic agricultural commodity:

"(a) The current average farm price for such commodity is not less than, and is not likely during the current or next succeeding marketing year for such commodity to be less than, the fair exchange value thereof, or

"(b) The conditions of and factors relating to the production, marketing, and consumption of such commodity are such that none of the powers conferred in subsections (2) and (3), and no combination of such powers, would, if exercised, tend to effectuate the declared policy of this title or that the exercise thereof would not be administratively practicable,

he shall cause an immediate investigation to be made to determine such facts. If, upon the basis of such investigation, the Secretary finds the existence of such facts, he shall not exercise any of such powers with respect to such commodity after the end of the marketing year current at the time when such finding is made and prior to a new finding under subsection (1) of this section.

"(5) In the course of any investigation required to be made under subsection (1) or subsection (4) of this section, the Secretary of Agriculture shall hold one or more hearings, and give due notice and opportunity for interested parties to be heard.

"(6) No payment under this title made in an agricultural commodity acquired by the Secretary in pursuance of this title shall be made in a commodity other than that in respect of which the payment is being made. For the purposes of this subsection, hogs and field corn may be considered as one commodity.

"(7) In the case of sugar beets or sugarcane, in the event that it shall be established to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Agriculture that returns to growers or producers, under the contract for the 1933–34 crop of sugar beets or sugarcane, entered into by and between the processors and producers and/or growers thereof, were reduced by reason of the payment of the processing tax, and/or the corresponding floor stocks tax, on sugar beets or sugarcane, in addition to the foregoing rental or benefit payments, the Secretary of Agriculture shall make such payments, representing in whole or in part such tax, as the Secretary deems fair and reasonable, to producers who agree, or have agreed, to participate in the program for reduction in the acreage or reduction in the production for market, or both, of sugar beets or sugarcane.

"(8) In the case of rice, the Secretary of Agriculture, in exercising the power conferred upon him by subsection (2) of this section to provide for rental or benefit payments, is directed to provide in any agreement entered into by him with any rice producer pursuant to such subsection, upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary determines will best effectuate the declared policy of this title, that the producer may pledge for production credit in whole or in part his right to any rental or benefit payments under the terms of such agreement and that such agreement and that such producer may designate therein a payee to receive such rental or benefit payments.

"(9) Under regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture requiring adequate facilities for the storage of any nonperishable agricultural commodity on the farm, inspection and measurement of any such commodity so stored, and the locking and sealing thereof, and such other regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture for the protection of such commodity and for the marketing thereof, a reasonable percentage of any benefit payment may be advanced on any such commodity so stored. In any such case, such deduction may be made from the amount of the benefit payment as the Secretary of Agriculture determines will reasonably compensate for the cost of inspection and sealing but no deduction may be made for interest."

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KVALE: On page 8, line 8, at the end of the section, add the following subsection:

"(10) No agreement shall be entered into pursuant to the provisions of this section unless such agreement shall contain provisions with respect to agricultural laborers, share tenants, and share croppers employed or engaged in farming upon all land owned or controlled by any party to such agreement:

"(A) Providing for the distribution, directly to and in the name of the particular party in interest, of any payments made pursuant to such agreements upon such basis as the Secretary deems fair and just between owners, landlords, share tenants, and share croppers."

Mr. JONES (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Chairman, the reading has progressed far enough to show that this amendment is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, may we have the full amendment read? I submit the point of order should be made after the amendment has been read.

Mr. JONES. I do not object to having the amendment printed in the RECORD, but I do not see any use in reading a lot of matter here that is clearly not germane, and I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the section or to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has noted the gentleman's point of order, but would suggest that the reading of the amendment be completed before ruling on the point of order.

(B) Providing that any adjustment in acreage or production required or effected pursuant to such agreement shall be effected ratably among such persons as continue to be employed or engaged in farming upon the land covered by such agreement, and that the same number of share-tenants, of share-croppers, and of agricultural laborers which was employed or engaged in farming before such agreement was entered into upon the land covered by such agreement shall be employed or engaged in farming upon such land at all times during the period covered by such agreement.

(11) The Secretary of Agriculture, or any person employed or engaged in farming upon the land covered by any agreement entered into pursuant to this section, may bring a bill in equity, regardless of the amount in controversy, in the District Court of the United States for the district in which such land is located to enjoin the breach or compel the observance of any provision required by subsection (10) of this section or section 8g of this title, to be included in the agreement covering the land upon which such person is employed or engaged in farming. Violation of any such provision by any party to any such agreement is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor and shall be punishable by a fine of not less than $50 and not more than $100 for each day that such violation continues.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. KVALE. I think not, Mr. Chairman. I shall have to abide by the decision of the Chair, and I am hopeful the Chair will give the amendment a liberal construction. The amendment has been rather carefully drawn, and while I have no pride of authorship, I hope the amendment may be considered in order and that we may vote upon it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the generally accepted rule is that if any part of an amendment is subject to a point of order, the entire amendment is subject to the point of order, and this brings in entirely new subject matter not contained in either the section or the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment does introduce new subject matter not contemplated by the bill, and is clearly subject to a point of order. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to revise my remarks and to extend in the RECORD three telegrams which I have received in opposition to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I am in somewhat of a quandary in respect to this bill. I do not know whether I shall support it or not, but I do know that I am unalterably opposed to the inequitable, un-American, and in my opinion, uneconomical method of relief which it embodies.

When I passed through Gillette, Wyo., last year, on my way to California, Government agents were then in Gillette, with automobiles loaded with ammunition and firearms, with instructions to go out on the ranches and kill 200,000 head of sheep. These sheep, after slaughter, were to be left where they fell, the owners, however, to be permitted to take the hides if they wished. I cannot subscribe to such a policy of destruction and artificial stimulus of the price of foodstuffs.

This bill we are now discussing proposes also a curtailment in the production or distribution of oranges. I believe that every child in America should have an orange whenever he wants it and I protest the enactment of legislation which will make the consumption of oranges impossible for our poor and undernourished children.

Instead of limiting our production of oranges and other basic foods, I favor increased production in order that essential foodstuffs for a balanced diet may be available to all our people and through proper nutrition, the health of our Nation may be safeguarded.

I am in favor of assisting the agricultural producer to the fullest possible extent, but not through the means proposed in this bill.

Another feature in this bill to which I am opposed, and it is a very important one—is the processing tax, which is a tax levied upon the consumer.

If we are to have a processing tax, it should come from a general tax levy. This tax should be placed upon the surplus of large corporations, upon the larger incomes of $50,000 or more, and on gifts and inheritances. There are one hundred-and-forty-odd thousand families in the county of Los Angeles now on relief. Under the provisions of this bill this inequitable, unfair, and un-American processing tax, which each and every individual must pay, increases the cost of living to all our people, but the burden is heaviest on those whose funds are pitifully inadequate for the barest necessities of life.

By the imposition of these processing taxes the price of lard is raised 2½ cents per pound, flour $1.38 a barrel, boneless ham 7 cents a pound, sugar one-half cent a pound, bread one-half cent per loaf, salted peanuts 1½ cents per pound, and peanut butter 1¾ cents per pound. Taxes apparently will be continued for 2½ years on the cotton in women's and children's dresses, diapers, shirts, pajamas, overalls, sheets, handkerchiefs, underwear, work gloves, window curtains, thread, and so forth.

Today, in the city of Washington, bacon is 47 cents per pound and steak as high as 65 cents per pound. We should remember that the administration paid millions of dollars for the destruction of pigs and additional millions for the destruction of cattle and other livestock, with the idea of raising prices for the producer of these commodities, while under our ridiculous reciprocal tariff procedure we are importing 10 times more fats, oils, and so forth, than we are exporting, thus apparently curtailing our own production for the benefit and profit of foreign agricultural producers.

The administration, however, appears to be little concerned as to the plight of the consumer. Under the work-relief plans, wages as low as $19 per month are provided for our unfortunate, worthy unemployed. The maximum for the highest type of professional employee is $95 per month. With our present prices, how far will $19 per month go? Some of our workers will not be able to buy a pound of meat with the wages of a day's work! In our efforts to increase prices through unnatural processes, we are increasing the cost of living, lowering the American standard of living, lowering the American wage standard, and reducing the purchasing power of our people! Such short-sighted, inconsistent policies are their own assurance of failure!

Furthermore, I contend that this bill is unconstitutional. It is unfair to the general population to take general revenues to subsidize a distinct class of people as we are proposing to do in this bill, and it is discriminatory indeed to take the revenues from tariff imposts and to apply them in the interest of the farmers for the purpose of developing foreign trade. It is my opinion that the hundreds of millions of dollars of general revenue with which we propose to experiment to develop a foreign market could best be spent here at home for an adequate old-age pension and for pensions to the disabled and to widows with children who are without sufficient means of support. Certainly these American citizens, if they were given these millions of dollars, would spend this money here at home and the farmer would be directly benefited rather than hypothetically benefited through the proposed experiment of spending hundreds of millions of dollars to develop our foreign trade. The American market is one of the most valuable assets of this Nation, and we would do well to protect and maintain it in the interests of our own people, instead of sacrificing it for hoped-for advantages in foreign trade.

There is no individual with common sense who is opposed to giving the farmer an adequate return on his investment and labor, but even the farmer himself, in his heart, must condemn the stupidity of paying for crop destruction or idleness. Instead of trafficking with the public funds and placing an inordinate tax on the consumer, which doubly oppresses the unemployed, we should enact legislation now before us providing for the cost of production, plus a reasonable profit, for the farmer; we should enact the Frazier-Lemke bill to free the farmer from the tentacles of the money-lender and we should refrain from the present tendency of Government to coerce and intimidate one group within an industry at the expense of another. With the myriad of bureaus which have been established in the new deal and the bureaucracy which is being developed we may eventually find ourselves with one-half of our population in Government positions of one sort or another, seeking to tell the other 50 percent of the people how they should conduct their business.

I reiterate that I am somewhat in a quandary as to how to vote on this bill, due to the fact that certain of the larger cooperative associations favor this bill, while practically all of the smaller or independent associations oppose the bill.

Under leave to insert in the RECORD, I include herewith three of the many telegrams I have received, all of which were opposed to the enactment of this legislation.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., June 18, 1935.

JOHN H. HOEPPEL,
Representative, Washington, D. C.:

Undersigned vigorously oppose amendments Agricultural Adjustment Act. Prorating markets and limiting to specific grades and sizes absolutely unsound and confiscatory to some growers. Delegation authority to State officials by Secretary Agriculture we believe unconstitutional. Fifty percent approval clause absolutely unsound due inability enforce. Control into specific markets most unfair, as undersigned over period years have built up special trade certain markets. All undersigned at meeting June 14 passed following resolution:

"This group independent growers and shippers being of opinion present California-Arizona citrus marketing agreement not legal, and being operated only as gentlemen's agreement, and recognizing necessity orderly marketing method and agreeing continuance pro rate willing carry on provided following amendments to agreement adopted to make present program: Eliminate intrastate shipments from pro rate; eliminate f. o. b. shipping point acceptance orders from pro rate, the same regulations to apply on f. o. b. sales as apply export; that have only one area in pro rate."

Representing over 10,000 cars citrus, we ask your support our contentions. Unless these changes in amendments and new amendments added marketing agreement will foster monopolies and curtail if not completely eliminate smaller individual operators. Reply.

Hon. JOHN H. HOEPPEL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We oppose proposed amendments to Agricultural Adjustment Act, which permit monopoly under State authority, unfair, impracticable, discriminatory in volume movement to markets of specific grades, sizes, and quality, strangles exports, with like reaction on domestic shipments. Therefore, request California citrus fruits be excluded from amendments.

INDEX MUTUAL ASSOCIATION.

POMONA, CALIF., June 15, 1935.

JOHN H. HOEPPEL,
Representative, Washington, D. C.:

We oppose amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act and request that California citrus fruits be excluded from them, because—

First, permits proration of markets, limiting of specific grades, sizes, and qualities.

Second, limits exports when we should stimulate exports in order to relieve domestic markets.

Third, permits Secretary of Agriculture to pass control over to State officials.

Fourth, permits putting orders into effect upon 50-percent approval when experience proves that even with 90-percent approval it is difficult to administer agreements.

Controls volume going into specific markets, which is unfair and impracticable, because certain shippers have special trade in specific markets built up over many years.

Grade, size, and quality control are discriminatory because all do not have same amount of grades, sizes, and quality, which would compel some to ship less than others.

Permitting State officials to administer orders will prove disastrous. We urge you to prevent adoption of such amendments.

POTATOES

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I want to speak of the very serious situation that confronts us in Maine.

Coming down here with our native Yankee caution, exceedingly suspicious of encroachment upon our boasted individualism, we have now come to realize, so far as my part of the country is concerned, that we are confronted by a condition and not a theory. That condition is that potatoes in my district today are selling for 10 cents a barrel.

If some of you gentlemen concerned in cotton can conceive of cotton selling at 1 cent a pound, you can realize what it means to us. Or if corn were selling at 5 cents a bushel or wheat at 10 cents a bushel, you would realize what it means to us to have potatoes selling at 1 cent a peck. In Aroostook County this month 1,000,000 barrels of potatoes are being dumped into the fields to rot without a market of any kind into which they can move.

What is the answer to this question? I will not pretend to say in the brief time allotted to me, but I do wish to say that we are vitally concerned. We are faced with absolute ruin. We are willing and desirous to cooperate in any measure that shall afford to us some measure of relief.

We realize that potatoes may come within the classification in this bill as a vegetable. It is the conviction, however, of those who have given the closest study to the potato problem that under these amendments it will not be possible to assist in any adequate measure the potato producers of this country. We recognize that thus far there are 14 farm crops of the United States given recognition as basic commodities. Potatoes thus far have received no recognition, although they are the fourth food crop of the United States. We must ask of this assemblage before adjournment very serious consideration of the Warren bill that shall accord to potatoes something of the position to which they are entitled in the agricultural program as the fourth food crop of the United States.

We appreciate the consideration given to us by the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and his associates. We hope before this session closes that you may give to this commodity, and to 100,000 people in Maine who face ruin at the present time, and to millions of others concerned in the potato crop throughout the country, the same consideration that has been afforded to the 14 basic commodities hitherto extended aid. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The first sentence of subsection (b) of section 12 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "In addition to the foregoing, for the purpose of effectuating the declared policy of this title, a sum equal to the proceeds derived from all taxes imposed under this title are hereby appropriated to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture for (1) the acquisition of any agricultural commodity pledged as security for any loan made by any Federal agency, which loan was conditioned upon the borrower agreeing or having agreed to cooperate with a program of production adjustment or marketing adjustment adopted under the authority of this title, and (2) the following purposes under part 2 of this title: Administrative expenses, payments authorized to be made under section 8, and refunds on taxes."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JONES: Page 8, line 14, strike out the word "are" and insert the word "is."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. The Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by striking out section 8 (3) thereof and by adding after section 8b, the following new section:

"ORDERS

"SEC. 8c. (1) The Secretary of Agriculture shall, subject to the provisions of this section, issue, and from time to time amend, orders applicable to processors, associations of producers, and others, engaged in the handling of any agricultural commodity or product thereof specified in subsection (2) of this section. Such persons are referred to in this title as 'handlers.' Such orders shall regulate, in the manner hereinafter in this section provided, the handling of such agricultural commodity, or product thereof, in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, or so as directly to burden, obstruct, or affect, interstate or foreign commerce in such commodity or product thereof.

"COMMODITIES TO WHICH APPLICABLE

"(2) Orders issued pursuant to this section shall be applicable only to the following agricultural commodities and the products thereof (except products of naval stores), or to any regional, or market classification of any such commodity or product: Milk, fruits (including pecans and walnuts but not including apples and not including fruits for canning), tobacco, vegetables (not including vegetables for canning), and naval stores as defined in the Naval Stores Act. As used in this section, the term 'vegetables' includes soybeans.

"NOTICE AND HEARING

"(3) Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe that the issuance of an order will tend to effectuate the declared policy of this title with respect to any commodity or product thereof specified in subsection (2) of this section, he shall give due notice of and an opportunity for a hearing upon a proposed order.

"FINDING AND ISSUANCE OF ORDER

"(4) After such notice and opportunity for hearing, the Secretary of Agriculture shall issue an order if he finds, and set forth in such order, upon the evidence introduced at such hearing (in addition to such other findings as may be specifically required by this section) that the issuance of such order and all of the terms and conditions thereof will tend to effectuate the declared policy of this title with respect to such commodity.

"TERMS—MILK AND ITS PRODUCTS

"(5) In the case of milk and its products, orders issued pursuant to this section shall contain one or more of the following terms and conditions, and (except as provided in subsection (7)) no others:

"(A) Classifying milk in accordance with the form in which it is ultimately used or consumed, and fixing, or providing a method for fixing, minimum prices for each such use classification which all handlers shall pay, and the time when payments shall be made, for milk purchased from producers or associations of producers. Such prices shall be uniform as to all handlers, subject only to adjustments for (1) volume, market, and production differentials customarily applied by the handlers subject to such order, (2) the grade or quality of the milk purchased, and (3) the locations at which delivery of such milk, or any use classification thereof, is made to such handlers.

"(B) Providing:

"(i) for the payment to all producers and associations of producers delivering milk to the same handler of uniform prices for all milk delivered by them: Provided, That, except in the case of orders covering milk products only, such provision is approved or favored by at least three-fourths of the producers who, during a representative period determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, have been engaged in the production for market of milk covered in such order or by producers who, during such representative period, have produced at least three-fourths of the volume of such milk produced for market during such period; the approval required hereunder shall be separate and apart from any other approval or disapproval provided for by this section; or

"(ii) for the payment to all producers and associations of producers delivering milk to all handlers of uniform prices for all milk so delivered, irrespective of the uses made of such milk by the individual handler to whom it is delivered; subject, in either case, only to adjustments for (a) volume market, and production differentials customarily applied by the handlers subject to such order, (b) the grade or quality of the milk delivered, (c) the locations at which delivery of such milk is made, and (d) a further adjustment, equitably to apportion the total value of the milk sold by any handler, or by all handlers, among producers and associations of producers, on the basis of their production of milk during a representative period of time.

"(C) In order to accomplish the purposes set forth in paragraphs (A) and (B) of this subsection (5), providing a method for making adjustments in payments, as among handlers (including producers who are also handlers), to the end that the total sums paid by each handler shall equal the value of the milk purchased by him at the prices fixed in accordance with paragraph (A) hereof.

"(D) In order to accomplish the purposes set forth in paragraph (A) of this subsection (5), providing that all handlers shall pay the price specified in such order for milk utilized for manufacturing purposes for all milk delivered to them by producers who were not, upon the effective date of such order, regularly selling milk for consumption in the area covered thereby, for the period of 90 days from and after the commencement of deliveries by such producers, respectively.

"(E) Providing for the verification of weights, sampling, and testing of, and security for the payment for, milk purchased.

"(F) Nothing contained in this subsection (5) is intended or shall be construed to prevent a cooperative marketing association qualified under the provisions of the act of Congress of February 18, 1922, as amended, known as the 'Capper-Volstead Act', engaged in making collective sales or marketing of milk or its products for the producers thereof, from blending the net proceeds of all of its sales in all markets in all use classifications, and making distribution thereof to its producers in accordance with the contract between the association and its producers: Provided, That is shall not sell milk or its products to any handler for use or consumption in any market at prices less than the prices fixed pursuant to paragraph (A) of this subsection (5) for such milk.

"TERMS—OTHER COMMODITIES

"(6) In the case of fruits (including pecans and walnuts but not including apples and not including fruits for canning) and their products, tobacco and its products, vegetables (not including vegetables for canning) and their products, and naval stores as defined in the Naval Stores Act, orders issued pursuant to this section shall contain one or more of the following terms and conditions, and (except as provided in subsection (7)) no others:

"(A) Limiting, or providing methods for the limitation of, the total quantity of any such commodity or product, or of any grade, size, or quality thereof, produced during any specified period or periods, which may be marketed in or transported to any or all markets during any specified period or periods by all handlers thereof.

"(B) Allotting, or providing methods for allotting, the amount of such commodity or product, or any grade, size, or quality thereof, which each handler may purchase from or handle on behalf of any and all producers thereof, during any specified period or periods, under a uniform rule based upon the amounts produced or sold by such producers in such prior period as the Secretary determines to be representative, or upon the current production or sales of such producers, or both, to the end that the total quantity thereof to be purchased or handled during any specified period or periods shall be apportioned equitably among producers.

"(C) Allotting, or providing methods for allotting, the amount of any such commodity or product, or any grade, size, or quality thereof, which each handler may market in or transport to any or all markets, under a uniform rule based upon the amounts which each such handler has available for current shipment, or upon the amounts shipped by each such handler in such prior period as the Secretary determines to be representative, or both, to the end that the total quantity of such commodity or product, or any grade, size, or quality thereof, to be marketed in or transported to any or all markets during any specified period or periods shall be equitably apportioned among all of the handlers thereof.

"(D) Determining, or providing methods for determining, the existence and extent of the surplus of any such commodity or product, or of any grade, size, or quality thereof, and providing for the control and disposition of such surplus, and for equalizing the burden of such surplus elimination or control among the producers and handlers thereof.

"(E) Establishing, or providing for the establishment of, reserve pools of any such commodity or product, or of any grade, size, or quality thereof, and providing for the equitable distribution of the net return derived from the sale thereof among the persons beneficially interested therein.

"(F) Fixing, or providing methods for fixing, minimum prices at which any such commodity or product, or any grade, size, or quality thereof, shall be purchased by the first handlers subject to such order: Provided, That such first handlers, as a group, purchase or otherwise acquire not less than 50 percent of the total quantity of the commodity or product covered by such order directly from producers or associations of producers.

"TERMS COMMON TO ALL ORDERS

"(7) In the case of the agricultural commodities and the products thereof specified in subsection (2) orders shall contain one or more terms and conditions:

"(A) Prohibiting unfair methods of competition and unfair trade practices in the handling thereof.

"(B) Providing for the selection by the Secretary of Agriculture, or a method for the selection, of an agency or agencies and defining their powers and duties, which, among other things, shall include the powers:

"(i) To administer such order in accordance with its terms and provisions;

"(ii) To make rules and regulations to effectuate the terms and provisions of such order;

"(iii) To receive, investigate, and report to the Secretary of Agriculture complaints of violations of such order; and

"(iv) To recommend to the Secretary of Agriculture amendments to such order.

No person acting as a member of an agency established pursuant to this paragraph (B) shall be deemed to be acting in an official capacity, within the meaning of section 10 (g) of this title, unless such person receives compensation for his personal services from funds of the United States.

"(C) Incidental to, and not inconsistent with, the terms and conditions specified in subsections (5), (6), and (7) and necessary to effectuate the other provisions of such order.

"ORDERS WITH MARKETING AGREEMENT

"(8) Except as provided in subsection (9) of this section, no order issued pursuant to this section shall become effective until the handlers (excluding cooperative associations of producers who are not engaged in processing, distributing, or shipping the commodity or product thereof covered by such order) of not less than 50 percent of the volume of the commodity or product thereof covered by such order have signed a marketing agreement, entered into pursuant to section 8b of this title, which regulates the handling of such commodity or product in the same manner as such order.

"ORDERS WITH OR WITHOUT MARKETING AGREEMENT

"(9) (A) Any order issued pursuant to this section shall become effective in the event that, notwithstanding the refusal or failure of handlers (excluding cooperative associations of producers who are not engaged in processing, distributing, or shipping the commodity or product thereof covered by such order) of more than 50 percent of the volume of the commodity or product thereof covered by such order to sign a marketing agreement relating to such commodity or product thereof, on which a hearing has been held, the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, determines:

"(1) That the refusal or failure to sign a marketing agreement (upon which a hearing has been held) by the handlers (excluding cooperative associations of producers who are not engaged in processing, distributing, or shipping the commodity or product thereof covered by such order) of more than 50 percent of the volume of the commodity or product thereof specified therein tends to prevent the effectuation of the declared policy of this title with respect to such commodity or product, and

"(2) That the issuance of such order is the only practical means of advancing the interests of the producers of such commodity pursuant to the declared policy, and is approved or favored by at least two-thirds of the producers who, during a representative period determined by the Secretary, have been engaged in the production for market of the commodity specified in such marketing agreement or order, or by producers who, during such representative period, have produced for market at least two-thirds of the volume of such commodity produced for market during such period.

"MANNER OF REGULATION AND APPLICABILITY

"(10) No order shall be issued under this section unless it regulates the handling of the commodity or product covered thereby in the same manner as, and is made applicable only to persons in the respective classes of industrial or commercial activity specified in, a marketing agreement upon which a hearing has been held.

"REGIONAL RULE

"(11) (A) No order shall be issued under this section which is applicable to all production areas or marketing areas, or both, of any commodity or product thereof unless the Secretary finds that the issuance of several orders applicable to the respective regional production areas or regional marketing areas, or both, as the case may be, of the commodity or product would not effectively carry out the declared policy of this title.

"(B) Except in the case of milk and its products, orders issued under this section shall be limited in their application to the smallest regional production areas or regional marketing areas, or both, as the case may be, which the Secretary finds practicable, consistently with carrying out such declared policy.

"(C) All orders issued under this section which are applicable to the same commodity or product thereof shall, so far as practicable, prescribe such different terms, applicable to different production areas and marketing areas, as the Secretary finds necessary to give due recognition to the differences in production and marketing of such commodity or product in such areas.

"COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION AMENDMENT

"(12) Whenever, pursuant to the provisions of this section, the Secretary is required to determine the approval or disapproval of producers with respect to the issuance of any order, or any term or condition thereof, or the termination thereof, the Secretary may consider the approval or disapproval by any cooperative association of producers, bona fide engaged in marketing the commodity or product thereof covered by such order, or in rendering services for or advancing the interests of the producers of such commodity, as the approval or disapproval of the producers who are members of, stockholders in, or under contract with, such cooperative association of producers.

"RETAILER AND PRODUCER EXEMPTION

"(13) (A) No order issued under subsection (9) of this section shall be applicable to any person who sells agricultural commodities or products thereof at retail in his capacity as such retailer, except to a retailer in his capacity as a retailer of milk and its products.

"(B) No order issued under this title shall be applicable to any producer in his capacity as a producer.

"VIOLATION OF ORDER

"(14) Any handler subject to an order issued under this section, or any officer, director, agent, or employee of such handler, who violates any provision of such order (other than a provision calling for payment of a pro rata share of expenses) shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $50 or more than $500 for each such violation, and each day during which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate violation: Provided, That no person shall be convicted under this title because of any violation of any order or of any obligation imposed in connection therewith, if such violation occurs between the date upon which such person files with the Secretary a petition, with respect to such order or obligation, as provided for in subsection (15), and 5 days after the Secretary enters a ruling thereon.

"PETITION BY HANDLER AND REVIEW

"(15) (A) Any handler subject to an order may file a written petition with the Secretary of Agriculture, stating that any such order or any provision of any such order or any obligation imposed in connection therewith is not in accordance with law and praying for a modification thereof or to be exempted therefrom. He shall thereupon be given an opportunity for a hearing upon such petition, in accordance with regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President. After such hearing, the Secretary shall make a ruling upon the prayer of such petition which shall be final, if in accordance with law.

"(B) The District Courts of the United States (including the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia) in any district in which such handler is an inhabitant, or has his principal place of business, is hereby vested with jurisdiction in equity to review such ruling, provided a bill in equity for that purpose is filed within 20 days from the date of the entry of such ruling. Service of process in such proceedings may be had upon the Secretary by delivering to him a copy of the bill of complaint. If the court determines that such ruling is not in accordance with law, it shall remand such proceedings to the Secretary with directions either (1) to make such ruling as the court shall determine to be in accordance with law, or (2) to take such further proceedings as, in its opinion, the law requires. Nothing contained in this subsection (15) shall be construed to prevent, hinder, or delay the United States or the Secretary of Agriculture from pursuing the remedies provided for in section 8a (6) of this title. Any proceedings brought pursuant to section 8a (6) of this title (except where brought by way of counterclaim in proceedings instituted pursuant to this subsection (15)) shall abate whenever a final decree has been rendered in proceedings between the same parties, and covering the same subject matter, instituted pursuant to this subsection (15).

"TERMINATION OF ORDERS AND MARKETING AGREEMENTS

"(16) (A) The Secretary of Agriculture shall, whenever he finds that any order issued under this section, or any provision thereof, obstructs or does not tend to effectuate the declared policy of this title, terminate or suspend the operation of such order or such provision thereof.

"(B) The Secretary shall terminate any marketing agreement entered into under section 8b, or order issued under this section, at the end of the then current marketing period for such commodity, as specified in such marketing agreement or order, whenever he finds that such termination is favored by a majority of the producers who, during a representative period determined by the Secretary, have been engaged in the production for market of the commodity specified in such marketing agreement or order, provided that such majority have during such representative period produced for market more than 50 percent of the volume of such commodity produced for market during such period, but such termination shall be effective only if announced on or before such date (prior to the end of the then current marketing period) as may be specified in such marketing agreement or order.

"(C) The termination or suspension of any order or amendment thereto or provision thereof, shall not be considered an order within the meaning of this section.

"PROVISIONS APPLICABLE TO AMENDMENTS

"(17) The provisions of this section, section 8d, and section 8e applicable to orders shall be applicable to amendments to orders."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JONES: Page 9, line 24, after the word "thereof", insert the word "only."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado offers the following amendment: At the end of line 13, page 10, strike out the period and add the words "and edible dried beans."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Colorado that edible dried beans are vegetables. The only reason that the soybean is included is that the soybean, as sometimes happens, is not classified as a vegetable horticulturally. I am sure the edible dried bean is a vegetable and unless the gentleman has some reason to show that they are not so classified, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would like to take up the 5 minutes in order to get the situation before the House. I have not had any time.

Mr. JONES. The soybean is used not only for food but for other purposes. It so happens that some authorities classify the soybean as a vegetable and others do not, horticulturally. Usually it is not classified as a vegetable. The edible dried bean I am sure is a vegetable.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Are edible dried beans included in the word "vegetables" so as to make it unnecessary to specify it?

Mr. JONES. The word includes all these commodities named and the products thereof. Edible dried bean would either be a vegetable or the product of a vegetable.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to use my 5 minutes to get the situation before the committee.

Mr. JONES. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon putting this in the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I have not had any time to give any consideration to this amendment. If there is any Member here who knows any way by which a man can get time to consider anything, I wish he would let me in on it. I consider myself fortunate to be permitted to be present while the agricultural amendments are being considered, so that I can find out something about them.

Mr. Chairman, the bean is a very valuable agricultural commodity in the United States. It is a major agricultural commodity in California. It is a big thing in Idaho, it is a big thing in Wyoming, and Colorado, and New Mexco. It is an important industry in Michigan, and in New York and in other States. I worked for a year to get a marketing agreement. After 8 or 10 drafts, occupying much time in hearings, regional and national, there was worked out what the Department of Agriculture said was the finest marketing agreement that had ever been produced under that Department, but it failed of adoption for two reasons. One was that the dealers held out for fixed margins, and fixed resale prices. And the other was the drought, which came along and killed the bean crop of 1934 and sent beans sky-high in price, so that a lot of the growers said, "We are going to get all we want for beans without any marketing agreement", so they failed to sign up. Mr. Chairman, I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I predicted something last year in the national meeting in the city of Denver, which has been verified to me by the Department of Agriculture since the House convened today. I said, "If you fellows don't get together and adopt the marketing agreement to regulate this product, the first good crop year that comes along you will plaster this country with beans from Mexico to Canada and they will not be worth pulling out of the ground, just as they were not worth pulling out of the ground in 1933." My secretary came here a few moments ago to say that he had been called up by someone in the Department of Agriculture, with the information 1935 is going to be that kind of a year on the bean crop, and they will raise so much that they will not be worth pulling out of the ground.

It has been demonstrated in agriculture, and it will be demonstrated in industry with the passing of N. R. A., that the people cannot do what they ought to do or what they really want to do without the guiding and helping hand of the Government.

To meet that situation I introduced a bill making edible dried beans a basic commodity. Senator COUZENS introduced the same bill in the Senate. The truth is that my bill is the Couzens bill with my name on it. I hope somewhere along the line, either here or in the Senate, edible dried beans will be made a basic commodity. Edible dried beans are a really more important agricultural commodity than the name might indicate to gentlemen. I hope they will be taken care of under these amendments, so that in the marketing of the crop prices may be protected to the grower, as was proposed in the marketing agreement.

Mr. HOPE. Has the gentleman inquired of the officials of the Department of Agriculture whether edible dried beans are included in their definition of "vegetables"?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman from Kansas asks me whether I had inquired of the Department of Agriculture whether edible dried beans were included in the word "vegetables." I have not; but I just stated that my secretary came here a few minutes ago and said he was called up by someone in the Department of Agriculture, where my activities in behalf of this commodity are well known, with the suggestion that I undertake to get this amendment in the bill. So evidently they do not consider it within the word "vegetables" in the bill, and that is why I have proposed the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] has again expired.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the soybean is not generally considered an edible vegetable. It is a hay. It is a legume sowed like clover for the purpose of hay. I have a belief that if we include dried beans we would then have to name every possible edible vegetable that is used in a cured form, or else by naming one we would automatically eliminate the others. Therefore I oppose the amendment. I think the gentleman's beans are in no danger whatever. I think they would be classified as a vegetable.

Mr. DOBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. DOBBINS. I would not like the inference that soybean is a term applying to hay only to remain unchallenged. Soybeans in a great part of the country are not marketed in the form of hay at all, but are marketed in the matured form of the shelled beans. I am sure it is the intention of the committee, in reporting this bill out, to include shelled beans in the scope of the legislation, as well, perhaps, as the green bean plant when cut for hay. It happens that in our own State of Illinois more soybeans are grown for market than in all the other States, and one of the largest processing plants utilizing this crop is located in my own district. In cooperation with my colleagues from six or eight districts in Illinois, where soybeans constitute a money crop of increasing importance, I have devoted considerable effort to impress upon the Committee on Agriculture the necessity of protecting our bean market through the inclusion of this commodity in the terms of this bill. In that effort we had the influential and intelligent support of the president of the Illinois Agricultural Association and of the president of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

I am sure that all of us had in mind primarily the matured beans themselves more than the immature bean plant in the form of hay as the crop that will be in need of protection against price reductions. Therefore I should not like this debate to close without this statement as a precaution against some adventitious court decision in the future that might possibly construe this language in the bill as applying to hay only, on the strength of what the gentleman from Oklahoma has said.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The word "soybeans" certainly would not include the Great Northern, the White Navy, the Pinto, or any of the great bean varieties in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE] has expired.

Mr. JONES. I ask for recognition. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman said if we put "edible dried beans" in we might as well put everything else in. I am in favor of putting in everything else that we can help in this way. There is a separate potato bill pending; there is a separate rice bill pending. The rice people came to grief just like the bean people did, only they had signed up all but 2 percent of the growers and 7 percent of the producers, but that little 7 percent of chiselers killed the rice marketing agreement in Louisiana. I think it is a matter of extreme importance to a great agricultural industry to include it in this bill. If the bare inclusion is not sufficient, the bill can be perfected later on at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, there are several hundred bills pending before the Committee on Agriculture. That committee has worked practically every day hearing different people. It has not been the committee's intention to be discourteous if we have not acted on everything that has come up.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would not intimate anything of the sort. The gentleman from Texas is the able chairman of a hard-working committee, and we Members representing farm interests all admire and trust him.

Mr. JONES. In my judgment, I have no doubt at all but that the product to which the gentleman referred is included. Of course, marketing agreements may be made without any of these amendments. These orders may be applied where they do not all sign up with respect to these particular commodities. The act says "It shall be applicable only to the agricultural commodities and products thereof", which naturally would include all vegetables in every form. The term "soybeans" sounds like a vegetable, but it has been classified both ways. I have no doubt whatever, if the gentleman finds later that they have made such a ruling, which they have not made heretofore, the matter can be taken care of, and I will be glad to reconsider it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. But that will be too late.

Mr. JONES. I will state to the gentleman that there is no question but that edible beans in any form are included. It might as well be said that if we say "all dogs are included" it would not include a shepherd dog.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is the gentleman willing to state that the word "vegetable" includes edible dry beans?

Mr. JONES. I am, in my judgment.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would rather see it voted into the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Colorado) there were ayes 8 and noes 72.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDRESEN: On page 14, after line 11, insert a new subsection, as follows:

"(g) No marketing agreement or order applicable to milk and its products in any marketing area shall prohibit the marketing in that area of any milk or product thereof produced in any production area in the United States."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I think that is the meaning of the language as we have it now, but I have gone over it with several members of the committee at the gentleman's suggestion. It is simply clarifying and I have no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SAUTHOFF to the amendment offered by Mr. ANDRESEN: Strike out the word "prohibit" and insert in lieu thereof the words "limit or tend to limit."

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDRESEN], I think, has considerable merit and it should be adopted, but it uses the word "prohibit." In other words, that there shall be no marketing agreement, order, or regulation which will prohibit. I am satisfied that the Secretary of Agriculture is never going to formulate or promulgate any order or marketing agreement that is going to directly prohibit any dairy product going from my State into any other State.

Wisconsin dairy products have found barriers erected against them by New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts. This barring of Wisconsin dairy products is done under the specious argument that these States are thereby protecting the health of their citizens, but I submit that Wisconsin herds are as free from tuberculosis or Bang's disease as the herds in any of these States or any other State of the Union. Our farmers are being discriminated against unjustly, and I want to place some safeguard in this bill so as to protect them.

That is why I have changed the word "prohibit" to the words "limit or tend to limit." In other words, instead of putting in a direct limitation, I ask that the amendment be so altered that there can be no agreement, order, or regulation set up which would even tend to shut out the products of one State from another State.

I believe, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment should be amended as indicated.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin would absolutely wreck the whole milk program. In order to get away from the terrific conditions that have prevailed in the milk industry there is provided in the bill authority to fix a minimum price to producers. That, at least in a measure, would limit or tend to limit shipment, and yet the gentleman, I am sure, does not want to interfere with the price to producers. Then it is a universal custom in the marketing of milk to classify milk. This, in a way, is a limitation.

I am perfectly willing to adopt the first amendment suggested, because that simply treats all areas alike, for you could not prohibit someone from an outside area coming in so long as he complied with the conditions prescribed for that area; but if you said that no restrictions or limitations could be required, it would wreck the program, it would destroy every vestige of a program we have for milk.

I ask that the amendment to the amendment be voted down.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee if in his opinion there is anything in this bill that gives to the Secretary of Agriculture or to anyone else any power to restrict the free flow of milk or any other commodity between the various States?

Mr. JONES. No; there is nothing in it that will do that. The only tendency is to make all sections comply with the same rules.

Mr. BOILEAU. I have the same understanding of the bill and I agree entirely with the chairman of the committee. I have taken it up with representatives of the Department of Agriculture and they have interpreted the language of the bill the same as has the chairman of the committee and as I have.

I have yet to find anyone who has specifically pointed out wherein this bill gives such power to the Secretary of Agriculture. The bill gives to the Secretary the right to issue these orders and it states that he shall issue orders containing any one or more of the provisions of that particular section and no others. Unless there is something in that particular part of the bill giving the Secretary the right to make such an order, then, of course, he would not have the power to impose such a restriction; and I have been unable to find any such provision in the bill.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Fear has been expressed on the part of certain Members that some such power might be found in the bill. I offered my amendment, therefore, which the chairman of the committee consented to.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate the gentleman's attitude.

Mr. ANDRESEN. It will do no harm.

Mr. JONES. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota only on condition that the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin be rejected.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota that this can do no harm, but I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. JONES. I do not think it is necessary, either.

Mr. BOILEAU. If any one thinks there is danger in the provisions of this bill, I should be glad to have him point out where the danger lies.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, if there is nothing in this bill which would authorize the Secretary of Agriculture or any subordinate so to limit transportation or shipment of dairy products from one State into another, then the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF] can do no harm.

The three States of Minnesota, Iowa, and Wisconsin, produce about 45 percent of the butter made in this country and we are interested in this matter of the shipment of dairy products to other States.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I yield.

Mr. JONES. Would the gentleman object to the requirement that Chicago dealers pay the Wisconsin producer a minimum price?

Mr. HULL. Not at all.

Mr. JONES. That certainly would tend to limit.

Mr. HULL. This will not tend to limit, it will merely tend to prevent some man in the Agriculture Department from issuing an order that would stop the shipments of any dairy product from Wisconsin into the New York district, for instance, the Boston district, or the Chicago district, which is now being partially done under so-called "rulings" of boards of health.

Mr. JONES. The provision with reference to orders plainly states that in the case of milk and its products orders may contain the following conditions and none other. I think that is just as clear as it can be.

Mr. HULL. If that be the case, then there is no harm in this amendment as amended.

Mr. JONES. I have heard the gentleman from Wisconsin make speech after speech urging that a special price be given to producers, and I am surprised to hear him take the position he does here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOTT: Page 10, line 13, after the word "soybeans", strike out the period and insert "and hops."

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am offering an amendment which in the opinion of the hop growers of the Pacific coast is necessary to the successful continuance of their industry, and which, so far as I have been able to learn, has not been objected to upon its merits. I desire to amend section 8 (c) (2) by adding, after the word "soybeans", in line 13, on page 10, the words "and hops."

The objection to this amendment is the objection of the chairman and the majority members of the committee, and that objection is not to the merit of the proposal. The objection is simply that the chairman does not want to change this section either by adding to or subtracting from any of the commodities named in the bill. I submit that that objection is not valid if the amendment offered is meritorious. The chairman has suggested that all amendments changing this section be offered in the Senate, in order to expedite the bill in the House. That, in my opinion, is not a proper objection, either.

Objection has also been heard that this amendment is not necessary in this bill because a separate bill is now pending to make hops a basic commodity. That is a separate proposal and should stand or fall on its own merits. What we are asking here is simply the right to make marketing agreements which will have the sanction of law.

Ninety percent of the hops grown in the United States are grown upon the Pacific coast. It is an industry which furnishes one of our largest cash-money crops. Thousands of people are employed every year in the harvesting of this crop. In the State of Oregon alone there are 20,000 acres devoted to the growing of hops, and last year there was paid out to common labor alone more than $2,000,000. Several thousand people are employed every year in connection with the growing and harvesting of hops.

The reason this amendment is necessary is because the hop growers have very little control over their own industry, and they are obliged to sell their product for whatever is offered them. It costs 24 cents a pound to grow hops; yet the few hop buyers of the country, who virtually control the market, have got that industry so completely in their hands that they are paying now about 10 cents a pound for the hops which cost 24 cents a pound to grow. This condition has obtained for the last several years, and unless we can get some remedy whereby the hop growers on the Pacific coast are permitted to make a marketing agreement under which they will have something to say about the price they shall receive that industry is very likely to go out of business.

The immediate reason for the amendment is that hops are neither a vegetable nor a fruit, and Mr. McDrew, the hop specialist of the Agricultural Department, has stated before the subcommittee that on this account, unless hops are specifically named in this bill, no market agreement can be made in regard to that product.

The amendment which I have offered will injure no other industry. It is necessary for the protection of this industry, and I trust it will be accepted and that the provisions of this bill may be extended to the hop growers of the Pacific coast.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there are two or three bills pending before the committee in reference to hops. I think there is a bill pending in both the House and Senate which would make hops a basic commodity. We have included certain products in this bill, outlining what the orders may contain. It is necessary that these be very definite. There is provision for marketing agreements in the present bill and any time the hop growers out there can get a marketing agreement signed they may go forward with the marketing agreement.

I do not want to load this bill down with a great many things, even though there might be some merit in including some of them, until it is determined what course they want to pursue. I think this commodity should be excluded, and I therefore ask Mr. Chairman, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon be voted down.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. May I ask the gentleman if he is aware of the fact that more than 80 per cent of the hop growers of the Pacific coast have already signed the agreement and have been advised by the Department of Agriculture that unless hops are named in this bill their agreement will be of no avail and the only remedy they can get is to have the word "hops" inserted in this bill?

Mr. JONES. I think we better not include that item at this time.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. In view of the fact that by the repeal of the prohibition law we opened up a large market for the hop industry, and also in view of the fact that a number of States which are going back to the production of hops would be excluded from increasing their acreage if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon is adopted, I feel that this particular industry should be given ample time to develop and that there should not be any restrictions placed upon it at this time. Hop growers in my State who produced a very large volume of hops some years ago went out of this business during prohibition. They are returning to the production of hops now, and it would be unfair to put this restriction upon them, which, I understand, would result if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon is adopted.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. In our State the wheat growers and hog growers have voted 12 to 1 for this. If it is good for them, why would it not be good for the hop growers?

Mr. JONES. That is only on the regular processing fee. There is a bill pending to make hops a basic commodity, but it is not involved here. That is a different bill altogether.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 11 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I should like to have a couple of minutes to ask the Chairman of the Agricultural Committee a few questions.

Mr. REED of New York. I should also like to have 5 minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. I desire 5 minutes also.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I modify my request and ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all speeches under the 20-minute limitation may be limited to 4 minutes, with the exception of the time to be allotted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who asked for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, during yesterday and today while this bill has been under consideration, I have followed it with great interest and much concern. Even though many of the Members may not realize it, I represent a great agricultural district in Pennsylvania. Agriculture in Pennsylvania is of predominant interest and concern to the people. When I tell you that Pennsylvania ranks seventh in the list of agricultural States in the Western Hemisphere you may have reason to believe that I am concerned in agriculture, representing, as I do, one of those great districts. Furthermore, for many, many years, the people engaged in the agricultural industry east of the Allegheny Mountains have not been able to raise enough to supply the people of that section of the country with sufficient food. Therefore, we are sincerely concerned about the material welfare of the West and are always ready to help by way of a tariff or otherwise.

The gentleman from Kansas offers a challenge to the Eastern States in regard to the protective tariff not helping the farmers. Every Member from Pennsylvania I have ever known in the past 20 years has willingly and gladly, as I have and always will, voted for a protective tariff for the great agricultural industry of the country, because agriculture is the queen of all occupations. We all know that and admit it. While I regard this bill as almost impotent, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court, certainly my State of Pennsylvania is safe from any oppressive measures which may be adopted against the farmer or against anyone else—by Secretary Wallace or any other contingent part of the oligarchy that offers the most absurd and indefensible object of reducing agricultural acreage, destroying hogs and at the same time, under the flexible tariff, which gives the President full power to the extent of 50 percent, allow the importation of millions of pounds of butter, lard, cattle, and cottonseed meal.

I expect to stand for this bill as long as it contains anything that will benefit the farmer, but when the gentleman talks about the tariff not helping the farmer, I want you to admit the eternal truth which you cannot deny and cannot divide. The industry of agriculture is amply protected by the tariff, and if it is not, just propose one and everybody from the East will be in favor of it. I am hoping one of these days to see just what the 20 Democratic Members from Pennsylvania are going to do about this great protective tariff that made Pennsylvania and the East and the whole country great and rich and strong. The hope in this is that we have individual opinions which make collective opinions, and here comes mine. Will you listen to me a moment when I tell you what I think is wrong about the whole business in endeavoring to restore the country to prosperity? You have begun at the wrong side. You have begun at the side of production, forcing production on people who do not have the money to pay for it. Put the big industries into operation, which a properly applied tariff will do, thus creating consuming power and giving work to everyone. Start at the consuming side of this question and production will take care of itself. [Applause.]

AMERICA FOR AMERICANS

WASHINGTON, June 17.—Criticizing "the substitute offered by the President for the N. R. A.", Representative BENJAMIN K. FOCHT said today, "It may have its uses in covering the retreat before the sweeping decision of the Supreme Court, but the very name is discredited and it can be of little more value than substitutes usually are."

"In some instances," Focht continued, "the N. R. A. was working, but according to Senator BORAH only in cases where monopolies made their own codes which were invariably to the disadvantage of the little fellow or small dealer, while the antitrust laws were being disregarded.

"Mark Twain said of a man that he 'was only half as bad as he would be if there were two of him.' In this case of the N. R. A., if the stronger law failed ignominiously, how could this last and weaker proposal be of any effect or do more than cause controversy, which it might be well to avoid at this time."

FOCHT advised Roosevelt to "accept his failure to substitute dictatorship for representative government, to acknowledge the errors of the socialistic philosophy he has espoused, and to devote the remainder of his term to upholding America for Americans."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

I would like to get an interpretation of the language in lines 13 to 17, on page 12.

For instance, in my home State there are two large buyers of milk—Sheffield Dairies and the Dairymen's League. Does this language mean they must both pay exactly the same price for the milk, regardless of whether the milk is used for manufacturing purposes or for distribution as fluid milk?

Mr. JONES. No; they may have classifications with different prices for the different classifications. This is in accordance with the present custom. Insofar as possible, in handling all these matters, so they have advised us, they will use local committees and local customs and methods of handling. It is necessary to have different classes of milk, according to its use, and there will be a different price for the different uses and the different classifications when the custom or the need requires it.

Mr. SNELL. Then this language does not apply to that part of it?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. Are both of these companies obliged by this language to pay exactly the same price to the producer for milk?

Mr. JONES. They are, if it is for the same purpose.

Mr. SNELL. I wanted the gentleman to be very definite about that.

Mr. JONES. There may be some production and valuation differential where there is a little difference in shipment or in the freight rate, but that is only to take care of that particular situation; and, practically speaking, it will be the same price for the same quality or the same character of milk intended for the same use.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Then, in a town in the northern part of New York, where both of these companies are buying milk, according to this bill they both must pay exactly the same price for the same grade of milk.

Mr. JONES. For the same grade and for the same use—that is correct.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] to include hops among the nonbasic commodities.

A suggestion was made by the gentleman from New York that if hops should be included there would be restrictions on production that would exclude other States from this production. Under this bill there would be regional control. It would apply only to the Pacific coast unless New York wanted in. If it developed that we restricted production on the Pacific coast, or if we increased prices in the national market, this would accrue to the advantage of New York instead of to her disadvantage. She would share the benefits without the sacrifices that the Pacific coast industry would make. The present prices afford no inducement for anybody to plant hops in New York or elsewhere.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes; briefly.

Mr. PIERCE. I would like to have a definition of what the gentleman means by a nonbasic commodity. That is the reason I failed to get it included in committee. I made the motion but it was ruled out of order.

Mr. LEA of California. The gentleman from Oregon has proposed this amendment at the appropriate place in the bill. The basic commodities are specified. For them processing taxes may be levied. This amendment does not ask that privilege for hops.

The hops industry is a small one. It includes only 35,000 acres, but the annual labor employment exceeds an average of over $100 per acre. Hops are one of the most expensive agricultural products from the standpoint of labor employment in the United States. The industry gives direct employment to 40,000 persons a year.

For more than a year the hops industry has been endeavoring to get into a marketing agreement. A referendum was called recently and 82 percent of the growers in the Pacific Coast States took part in this referendum. It is now reported that in these three States the total vote was nearly 5 to 1 in favor of joining in a marketing agreement. The industry is now demoralized. Prices are only 50 percent of the production costs. Shall we now thwart their efforts to improve the situation?

If this plan is good for some, why is it not good for an industry like hops, where it is regarded of so much importance, and where the growers are so unanimously for it?

My colleague the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER] was on the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture, which had hearings on the bill, proposing to make hops a basic commodity. This amendment does not propose that. This amendment asks for no processing tax for the benefit of the hop industry. We simply ask that the hop industry be given this opportunity to help itself.

My colleague the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER] advises me that after contacting the Department of Agriculture upon the question, it was stated the Department had no objection to the inclusion of hops in this bill. If the policy of this bill is good for any commodity, it ought to be good for hops. I see no justice in excluding them.

So far as I am concerned, I think it regrettable that the committee has seen fit to discriminate between industries regardless of any logical basis of discrimination. Some are put in without much reason, and some of these products, where the industry has been heartily in favor of coming in, have been rejected without any reason. There is no logical basis for discrimination between this and other products included. So far as I am concerned, I believe the growers of every agricultural product ought to have an opportunity, when they show a sufficiently strong favorable sentiment, to be included in this bill and treated on a basis of equality. When they can qualify under equal standards they should be treated equally.

I believe this is a very meritorious amendment proposed by the gentleman from Oregon. The industry strongly wants it, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. CITRON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. In view of the fact that this act permits certain farm interests to make voluntary agreements to protect themselves against unfair trade practices, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee to explain why the industry of poultry raising and egg production have not been included?

Mr. JONES. As far as the voluntary agreements are concerned, they can still make the voluntary agreements under the original act, but they cannot have the orders enforced.

Of course, the poultry industry under the decision of the Supreme Court almost immediately becomes local, and so it is not thought practical to include it. A number of other commodities may ask to be included.

The gentleman's question indicates how impossible it is to include every commodity. Wool, mohair, poultry, and different character of nuts have been suggested. Definite plans would be necessary as to each of them. It is not possible to include every commodity.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CARY). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOTT) there were 28 ayes and 67 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. The Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is further amended by striking out subsection (4) of section 8 thereof and adding after section 8c thereof the following new sections:

"BOOKS AND RECORDS

"SEC. 8d. (1) All parties to any marketing agreement, and all handlers subject to an order, shall severally, from time to time, upon the request of the Secretary, furnish him with such information as he finds to be necessary to enable him to ascertain and determine the extent to which such agreement or order has been carried out or has effectuated the declared policy of this title, and with such information as he finds to be necessary to determine whether or not there has been any abuse of the privilege of exemptions from the antitrust laws. Such information shall be furnished in accordance with forms of reports to be prescribed by the Secretary. For the purpose of ascertaining the correctness of any report made to the Secretary pursuant to this subsection, or for the purpose of obtaining the information required in any such report, where it has been requested and has not been furnished, the Secretary is hereby authorized to examine such books, papers, records, accounts, correspondence, contracts, documents, or memoranda, as he deems relevant and which are within the control (1) of any such party to such marketing agreement, or any such handler, from whom such report was requested or (2) of any person having, either directly or indirectly, actual or legal control of or over such party or such handler or (3) of any subsidiary of any such party, handler, or person.

"(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 7, all information furnished to or acquired by the Secretary of Agriculture pursuant to this section shall be kept confidential by all officers and employees of the Department of Agriculture and only such information so furnished or acquired as the Secretary deems relevant shall be disclosed by them, and then only in a suit or administrative hearing brought at the direction, or upon the request, of the Secretary of Agriculture, or to which he or any officer of the United States is a party, and involving the marketing agreement or order with reference to which the information so to be disclosed was furnished or acquired. Nothing in this section shall be deemed to prohibit (A) the issuance of general statements based upon the reports of a number of parties to a marketing agreement or of handlers subject to an order, which statements do not identify the information furnished by any person, or (B) the publication by direction of the Secretary, of the name of any person violating any marketing agreement or any order, together with a statement of the particular provisions of the marketing agreement or order violated by such person. Any such officer or employee violating the provisions of this section shall upon conviction be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 or to imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or to both, and shall be removed from office.

"DETERMINATION OF BASE PERIOD

"SEC. 8e. In connection with the making of any marketing agreement or the issuance of any order, if the Secretary finds and proclaims that, as to any commodity specified in such marketing agreement or order, the purchasing power during the base period specified for such commodity in section 2 of this title cannot be satisfactorily determined from available statistics of the Department of Agriculture, the base period, for the purposes of such marketing agreement or order, shall be the post-war period, August 1919–July 1929, or all that portion thereof for which the Secretary finds and proclaims that the purchasing power of such commodity can be satisfactorily determined from available statistics of the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein certain excerpts from legal decisions and newspaper articles.

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the provisions in this bill, H. R. 8492, which attempts to legalize, ratify, and confirm the illegal acts heretofore committed by this administration under the A. A. A., and by the adoption of these amendments to debar the taxpayers from recovering such illegal taxes imposed by the Government under that act is an example of legislative and executive tyranny, the ultimate consequences of which are startling and fearful to contemplate.

There are times when the deadly parallels of history are interesting and instructive. Magna Carta had its birth more than seven centuries ago. It faced many bitter contests for hundreds of years before it was finally accepted by all of the rulers of the English-speaking race. The representatives of a united and outraged citizenry, insistent upon restoring and preserving their ancient rights under the law of the land, forced an arbitrary ruler to recognize those rights by forcing him to affix the royal seal to the great charter.

King John was long on promises and short on fulfillment. What a day for the English-speaking race, when on June 15, 1215, 720 years ago, the army representing the people camped on the meadow of Runnymede, while the chosen delegates met King John on what is now reverently called "Charta Island." The King hesitated, rebelled, and fumed, but he signed and sealed one of the greatest documents in all history. That immortal parchment, after the lapse of more than seven centuries, grips the imagination and stirs the affections of the entire English-speaking race.

What a picture. On one side was the powerful, arrogant King of a great nation, who had trampled under his feet the laws of the land, who had corrupted the courts, who had taken away the liberties of the people, who had plundered them through taxation, who had broken down every defense which they had against arbitrary rule. On the other side stood the representatives of a brave, self-reliant, and undaunted people demanding from that King the restoration of the laws of their fathers. They did not cringe in the presence of royal power. They risked everything, even life itself, to regain the priceless heritage of liberty.

History records that when King John had reluctantly put his seal to the great charter, he returned to Windsor, and as he reflected upon the incidents of that eventful day and the arbitrary powers he had surrendered, he was seized with a fit of anger, and in his uncontrollable rage he rolled on the floor and chewed straws and sticks. The brain storm passed. The records reveal that he soon resumed his cunning and his craft. The wiley King John, who had entered into a solemn covenant with the people, annulled the great charter in August 1215; then he promptly usurped the rights of the citizenry and reestablished his arbitrary rule.

Throughout the intervening years the everlasting principles protecting life, liberty, and property embodied in that sacred document were often overthrown, only "like truth crushed to earth", to rise again. The survival of the great charter ought to be an inspiration to every liberty-loving person, for it imparts the lesson that a free people, unless bereft of reason and of character, will never permanently surrender nor barter away the priceless heritage of freedom.

The Supreme Court of the United States is the great forum, the Runnymede, the Charta Island, the last refuge of the humblest citizen. While this great institution of impartial justice stands unimpaired the life, the liberty, and the property of every American citizen will be secure from legislative tyranny and arbitrary executive action. The Federal Constitution for 147 years has stood the test of every war and every economic storm. Under its beneficent and wise provisions the Nation has prospered and the people of the United States have enjoyed a measure of prosperity and liberty unknown to the citizens of any other nation.

How prophetic are the words of one of the distinguished fathers of our Federal Constitution, who almost a century and a half ago graphically portrayed that only under "a good constitution can liberty be enjoyed and be secure." Let me quote this man:

> The influence of a good or bad constitution is not less powerful on the citizen, considered as individuals, than on the community, considered as a body politic. It is only under a good constitution that liberty—the priceless gift of heaven—can be enjoyed and be secure. This exalting quality comprehends, among other things, the manly and generous exercise of our powers, and includes, as its most delicious ingredient, the happy consciousness of being free.
> What energetic, what delightful sensations must this enlivening principle diffuse over the whole man! His mind is roused and elevated, his heart is rectified and enlarged, dignity appears in his countenance, and animation in his every gesture and word. He knows that if he is innocent and upright, the laws and constitution of his country will insure him protection. He trusts that if to innocence and integrity he adds faithful and meritorious services, his country, in addition to protection, will confer upon him honorable testimonies of her esteem. Hence he derives a cheerful and habitual confidence; this pervades and invigorates his conduct and spreads a noble air over every part of his character. Hence, too, he is inspired with ardent affection for the public; this stimulates and refines his strongest patriotic exertions. His heart, his head, his hands, his tongue, his pen, his fortune, all he is and all he has, are devoted to his country's cause and to his country's call.

The distinguished jurist then paints a word picture of a person consigned to live under a constitution that suffers and permits tyranny and arbitrary rule. Again I quote:

> A person of a very different description appears in view—pale, trembling, emasculated, faltering in his steps, not daring to look upwards, but, with marked anxiety, rolling his eager eyes on every side. Who is he? He is the slave of a bad constitution and a tyrannical government. He is afraid to act, or speak, or look. He knows that his actions and his words, however guarded, may be construed to be criminal; he knows that even his looks and countenance may be considered as the signs and evidences of treacherous thoughts and treasonable conspiracies; and he knows that the suspicion of his masters, upon any of these points, may be fatal; for he knows, that he is at the mercy of those, who, upon the slightest suspicion, may seize and hang him, who may do whatever they please with him, and with all those who are dear to him.
> What effects must this man's situation produce upon his mind and temper? Can his views be great and exalted? No. Such views, instead of being encouraged, would give offense; and he is well aware of what would follow. Can openness and candor beam from his soul? No. Such lights would be hateful to his masters; it must be extinguished. Can he feel affection for his country, its constitution, or its government? No. His country is his prison; its constitution is his curse; and its government is a rod of oppression, held continually over his head.
> What must this man be? He must be abject, fawning, dastardly, selfish, disingenuous, deceitful, cunning, base—but why proceed in the disgusting detail? He must receive the stamp of servility fully impressed upon his person, on his mind, and on his manners.

Mr. Chairman, is it not evident that the great and good men who framed the Federal Constitution were well aware of the benefits to be derived under a good constitution? Is it not evident that they sought to anticipate and guard against tyranny, whether legislative or executive? Did it ever occur to the fathers of the Federal Constitution that a time might come when the legislative and the executive departments of the Government would join forces in establishing an executive dictatorship? They had sufficient penetration and vision to realize that without the violent overthrow of the Government by revolutionary forces, the liberties of the people guaranteed to them under the Constitution could not be taken from them by Executive usurpation unless surrendered to the Executive by an abject or by a venal Congress.

Those who are now active in attempting to set up a new form of government in place of our constitutional form have been brought to an abrupt halt in their efforts to do so by the Supreme Court. The recent decisions of this great tribunal have temporarily balked the plan, and these decisions have restored to the citizens of the United States some of their former constitutional liberties.

Figuratively speaking, if the report of the press conference at the White House following the Supreme Court decision was authentic, the ancient episode of rolling on the floor and chewing straws and sticks was most dramatically reenacted.

Mr. Chairman, I turn to another point. "New dealers" now raise their voice in opposition to the right of the Supreme Court to question the validity of an act of Congress, asserting that such a power was not contemplated by those who framed the Federal Constitution.

The views of Judge James Wilson with reference to the reasons why the Supreme Court of the United States should have the right and the power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional is of interest, especially at this time, when, as I have said, men connected with this administration would have the people believe that the men who framed the Federal Constitution had not considered the question and did not contemplate granting any such power. This eminent jurist, whom I have had the honor to quote, delivered a series of lectures on law in the College of Philadelphia during the winter of 1790 and 1791. In one of these lectures he discussed the specific questions as to the power of the Supreme Court to declare unconstitutional a law enacted by Congress. At the time he delivered his views on the subject, the Supreme Court had not been called upon to consider the question. May I add that Judge Wilson was a member of the convention that framed the Federal Constitution, and he was chairman of the committee which reported the document. Here is what he had to say on the point:

> From the Constitution, the legislative department, as well as every other part of government, derives its power; by the Constitution, the legislative, as well as every other department, must be directed; of the Constitution, no alteration by the Legislature can be made or authorized.
> "In our system of jurisprudence, these positions appear to be incontrovertible. The Constitution is the supreme law of the land; to that supreme law every other power must be inferior and subordinate.
> "Now, let us suppose that the Legislature should pass an act manifestly repugnant to some part of the Constitution, and that the operation and validity of both should come regularly in question before the Court, forming a portion of the judicial department. In that department the 'judicial power of the United States' is vested 'by the people', who 'ordained and established' the Constitution. The business and the design of the judicial power is to administer justice according to the law of the land. According to two contradictory rules, justice, in the nature of things, cannot be administered. One of them must of necessity give place to the other. Both, according to our supposition, come regularly before the Court for its decision on their operation and validity. It is the right and it is the duty of the Court to decide upon them; its decision must be made, for justice must be administered according to the law of the land. When the question occurs: What is the law of the land? it must also decide this question. In what manner is this question to be decided? The answer seems to be a very easy one. The supreme power of the United States has given one rule; a subordinate power in the United States has given a contradictory rule; the former is the law of the land; as a necessary consequence, the latter is void, and has no operation. In this manner it is the right and it is the duty of a court of justice under the Constitution of the United States to decide.

"This is the necessary result of the distribution of power, made by the Constitution, between the legislative and the judicial departments. The same Constitution is the supreme law of both. If that Constitution be infringed by one, it is no reason that the infringement should be abetted, though it is a strong reason that it should be discountenanced and declared void by the other.

"The effects of this salutary regulation, necessarily resulting from the Constitution, are great and illustrious. In consequence of it the bounds of the legislative power are not only distinctly marked in the system itself, but effectual and permanent provision is made that every transgression of those bounds shall be adjudged and rendered vain and fruitless. What a noble guard against legislative despotism.

"This regulation is far from throwing any disparagement upon the legislative authority of the United States. It does not confer upon the judicial department a power superior, in its general nature, to that of the legislature; but it confers upon it, in particular instances, and for particular purposes, the power of declaring and enforcing the superior power of the Constitution—the supreme law of the land.

"This regulation, when considered properly, is viewed in a favorable light by the Legislature itself. 'It has been objected,' said a learned Member of the House of Representatives, in a late debate, 'that by adopting the bill before us, we expose the measure to be considered and defeated by the judiciary of the United States, who may adjudge it to be contrary to the Constitution, and therefore void, and not lend their aid to carry it into execution. This gives me no uneasiness. I am so far from controverting this right in the judiciary that it is my boast and my confidence. It leads me to greater decision on all subjects of a constitutional nature, when I reflect, that, if from inattention, want of precision, or any other defect, I should be wrong, there is a power in the Government, which can constitutionally prevent the operation of a wrong measure from affecting my constituents. I am legislating for a nation, and for thousands yet unborn; and it is the glory of the Constitution, that there is a remedy for the failures even of the Legislature itself.'"

Mr. Chairman, may I call attention to the fact that the learned Member of the House of Representatives to whom Judge Wilson refers was Hon. Elias Boudinot, of New Jersey, a distinguished member of the bar. He was a Member of the Continental Congress 1777, 1778, and 1781–84; was President of the Congress 1782–83 and signed the treaty of peace with England. He was elected to the First, Second, and Third Congresses (Mar. 4, 1789–Mar. 3, 1795).

It is apparent from the lecture delivered by Judge Wilson, who sat in the Convention that framed the Federal Constitution, that under that Constitution the Supreme Court and all Federal courts are bound to measure the constitutionality of every legislative act by the supreme law of the land. I repeat that these views were expressed by this distinguished jurist before the Supreme Court had been called upon to pass upon the question. It is apparent from the statement made by Hon. Elias Boudinot, a Member of the House of Representatives, that as a legislator he did not question the doctrine.

The Chief Executive and his more vocal mouthpieces seem to resent the recent action of the Supreme Court in performing its duty under the Constitution. The President grows bitter when prevented from riding rough-shod over the supreme law of the land. The Chief Executive, now that his dictatorial powers have been partially curtailed and brought within constitutional limits, has displayed the temper of King John. Does he plan to further emulate that unfortunate ruler, ignore the people's rights and trample upon their liberties, should the opportunity present itself?

I have read with deep concern press reports as to the hostile attitude of President Roosevelt toward the Supreme Court of the United States. There was an article written by Mark Sullivan, published in the New York Herald Tribune, June 14, 1935, in which the author points out that had the Supreme Court by its decision in the gold case have required the Government to pay in gold according to the terms of the bonds under the old standard of value, the President was all ready to resist the decision. I quote from Mr. Sullivan's article:

[From the New York Herald Tribune]

SPEECH SAID TO BE PREPARED

In anticipation of the possibility that the Court might call on the Government to pay, Mr. Roosevelt had prepared a plan. The plan contemplated direct refusal to obey the Court's possible order. The plan further contemplated a radio appeal to the country, asking for public endorsement of the President's refusal to obey.

The plan was revealed in a dispatch by Mr. Arthur Krock in the New York Times on February 21. The pertinent parts of Mr. Krock's dispatch read as follows:

"If the Supreme Court had ruled that the Government must pay * * * the President would have addressed the people that night. * * * Had this address * * * been delivered, it would have marked the most sensational and historic episode in the constitutional history of the United States since Andrew Jackson said of a Supreme Court ruling: 'John Marshall has made this decision; now let him enforce it' * * *. The writer tonight learned that a draft of the speech was prepared * * *. Had the President delivered it the clearest issue yet presented by the new deal would have been made. * * * The helmsmen of the new deal do not question that the people would have rallied behind the President. * * * Delivery of the speech that was prepared would have opened a new and remarkable chapter in American history. * * * The speech, this writer learns, is still in the President's possession. Circumstances may arise which will require its delivery."

ROOSEVELT NOT BACKING DOWN

It may be asked now why the President did not deliver this speech to the country after the Supreme Court decision invalidating the N. R. A. 2 weeks ago. It would be a mistake to infer that the President backed away from his earlier position. On the contrary, as the public partly knows, the President's dissent from the Supreme Court's decision in the N. R. A. case was very strong and was accompanied by strong feeling.

The reason the President's speech prepared in anticipation of the Liberty bond decision could not be delivered after the N. R. A. decision lies in an essential difference between the two cases. The Supreme Court's decision in the Liberty bond case, had it been adverse to the Government, would have been an order to the administration to do something, to take an affirmative step, to pay money. This the administration could and would have simply refused to do. Thereafter nothing would have happened. The administration would have defied an order of the court, would have "defeated judgment", as lawyers say—and that would have been that.

In the N. R. A. case, however, the Court's decision against the administration was of a different nature. In the N. R. A. case the Court did not order the administration to do anything, hence there was nothing the administration could refuse to do. In the N. R. A. case the court merely decided that the citizens who were defendants—the Schechter brothers—need not pay the fines or incur the penalties which the N. R. A. statute said they must suffer. There was in the N. R. A. case no opportunity for Mr. Roosevelt to defy the Court in the sense of refusing to do something the Court ordered. Mr. Roosevelt's feeling could only be expressed as he did express it, in public expression of his hostile opinion of the decision.

A. A. A. CASE MAY BRING DEFIANCE

There is ahead another kind of case which, if the Court decides against the administration, may give the President the opportunity to refuse to obey an order of the Court. This will be one of the A. A. A. cases. Under the A. A. A. the administration collects what the administration calls a "processing tax" from manufacturers of cotton and other farm products. Some manufacturers have paid this tax under protest and are now suing the Government to get it back. If one of these cases should be decided by the Supreme Court against the Government the decision would call on the administration to take an affirmative step to return the money. This the administration could refuse to do.

In short, a triple-A case, if the Supreme Court decides it against the Government, may provide Mr. Roosevelt the opportunity for the kind of direct defiance of a Supreme Court order which Mr. Krock says President Roosevelt anticipated and prepared for in the Liberty bond case.

It is already clear that Mr. Roosevelt is willing and eager that challenge to the Supreme Court by words, such as he has already spoken, should be an issue before the country. It remains to be seen whether he is willing to make the issue one of defiance by deed. It is possible the issue in the latter form may be postponed until after next year's election. It is also possible Mr. Roosevelt may avoid defying any decision of the Court that is unanimous and may wait for one in which the Court divides.

I hope this press report does not register the attitude of the President toward the Supreme Court, nor accurately reflect his intention to defy the Court in the event of future decisions by this great tribunal adverse to new-deal legislation.

If this press report be true, what an example of Executive contempt for the law of the land and for an independent judiciary, in duty bound to defend and protect the Constitution!

How different the calm and judicial admonition of Washington to his fellow countrymen to observe and obey in letter and in spirit the supreme law of the land; and especially to avoid transgressing the bounds by any act of usurpation. In his Farewell Address he said:

It is important likewise that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern, some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 6 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 6, after the comma and the word "accounts", add the following: "Federal income-tax reports."

Mr. JONES. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, my point is this. My purpose is to give the Secretary of Agriculture power to examine the records, books, documents, papers, and so forth of processors and handlers in order to help him to make his orders. In order to help him I have added, in addition to the books, documents, papers, and so forth, "Federal income-tax reports", one of the best sources of information the Secretary could possibly have in order to get information upon which to base his orders and rulings.

Of course, I know that the original income-tax report will be filed with the Government, but there must be a copy of such report kept by the processor, or handler, for a period of 1 year and we can get at that and then the Department of Justice can compare that report with the original and also the books of the company and ascertain what the true facts really are.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I think the gentleman could get that under the present amendment. After I see his amendment I think it is germane, but I think it is wholly unnecessary, for this reason. You have under this provision access to the records from which the income taxes are made up which, of course, goes behind them. What I fear is that if we adopt this, we might not be able to have access by implication to the State income-tax records.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. The difficulties we have always had in an attempt to examine the Federal income taxes were injunctional proceedings in the Federal court.

Mr. JONES. I want them examined, and they have authority not only to examine under the present language——

Mr. SAUTHOFF. No; there is no authority under this act. All the authority you have under this act is to go into the office of the processor and examine his books, but you cannot go into the income-tax department of the Treasury Department and examine their books. That is sound law. I do not have to refer to any of the attorneys of the Department, because we have had that question up in years gone by. It has been decided against the Government. Let us give the Government power and not hamstring it, and deprive it of opportunity to go in and examine income-tax reports. The processor's office is not the place where the income-tax reports are filed. They are filed either in Washington or in the regional office, and you have to be able not only to show the law on which you can stand to go in there and get it, but many times you have to go to court to get an order before you can look at income-tax reports. In the case of milk, in the last few years we had in the State of Wisconsin one dairy company, the president of which received a salary in a depression year, when the farmer could not even get cost of production, of $206,000 a year, and in addition to that his wife drew down $57,000 as an additional salary as vice president. Let us get at those records. That is the thing that I am after, and I hope that the Committee will vote in favor of this amendment. It is to be regretted that every time we of Wisconsin have made an effort to examine income-tax reports, whether State or Federal, every conceivable argument is brought forward to defeat such a proposal. Let us not handicap the Government in its effort to do something constructive. Let us give our departments every possible assistance.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman evidently has drawn his amendment without thinking what it will do. The measure as written provides access to all the books, papers, records, accounts, correspondence, contracts, documents, or memoranda that he deems relevant and which are within the control of any such party. That is all he can get. If the gentleman would say copies of income-tax returns, then I am willing to accept the amendment, because even under the present language he can get facts from which those reports are made, but certainly the income-tax report itself is not in the control of the party whose books are made subject to examination. I shall not have any objection if the gentleman will say copies of income-tax reports.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. That will not do us any good.

Mr. JONES. He has to withhold copy for a year under the income-tax law. A man must keep his own records and a copy of the record from which they are made up. If the gentleman will look at the language of this measure he will see that the income-tax report itself goes to the Department and it is not any longer within his control. The subsequent language would nullify the effect of the gentleman's language. I withdraw any point of order on it, because I want them to have access to all of this. I reserved the point of order because my attention was distracted at the moment and I wanted to know what was in the amendment before I agreed to let it come in. If the language is properly drawn, I have no objection to his having this information. The gentleman says they are going into the books of these processors to see whether they are complying with the law. If he will say copies of income-tax reports which he has on file there—and that is all he could have—I will accept the amendment.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I agree to that.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Might I suggest that we put in the language "certified copies of their income-tax reports."

Mr. JONES. They could require it in any form they want. I would not want to say sworn and certified copies, because I do not know what form of copies they keep. The originals are sworn to. Make it copies, and I shall agree to it.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Very well.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be changed to make it "copies of income-tax returns."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. SAUTHOFF: Page 26, line 6, after the comma following the word "records", insert "copies of Federal income-tax reports."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, why have the word "Federal"? Let us give them access to copies of both the Federal and State returns.

I ask unanimous consent that the word "Federal" be stricken from the amendment, so that they may have access to copies of both Federal and State income-tax reports.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the modified amendment, as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. SAUTHOFF: On page 26, line 6, after the comma following the word "records", insert "copies of income-tax reports."

The modified amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the word "agreements" on page 27, line 3, be changed to "agreement." It is a typographical error.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the change will be made.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. Subsection (5) of section 8 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is further amended by designating said subsection as section 8f, by inserting said section at the end of section 8e, and by striking out the last sentence thereof.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KVALE: On page 28, line 17, at the end of the section, add the following new section to be entitled "section 7 (a)":

"SEC. 7. (a) The Agricultural Adjustment Administration, as amended, is amended by adding after section 8 (f) the following new section:

"'SEC. 8. (g) No agreement, marketing agreement, or order shall be executed or issued pursuant to the provisions of section 8, 8 (b), or 8 (c) of this title, unless such agreement, marketing agreement, or order shall contain provisions with respect to agricultural laborers, share tenants, and share croppers employed by any person who is a party to, or beneficiary of any such agreement or marketing agreement, or by any person who is subject to any such order:

"'(A) Prohibiting the employment of children under the age of 16 years, and limiting the hours of labor during any 1 day for children between the ages of 16 and 18 years to 8 hours;

"'(B) fixing minimum wages, maximum hours, and terms and conditions of employment or tenure which shall give such agricultural laborers, share tenants, and share croppers a fair and decent standard of living;

"'(C) giving the right to such agricultural laborers, share tenants, and share croppers to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to be free from interference, restraint, or coercion of their employers or landlords, in the designation of such representatives, or in self-organization, or in any other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or any other mutual aid or protection; and

"'(D) directing that no such agricultural laborer, share tenant, or share cropper, and no one seeking employment or tenance with any such producer, processor, or landlord shall be required, as a condition of employment or tenancy to join any company union, or to refrain or agree to refrain from joining or from assisting a labor organization of his own choosing.'"

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield before he makes the point of order?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Does the gentleman mean that a farm lad under 16 years of age shall not perform labor on his father's farm?

Mr. KVALE. Not at all. That is not in anywise the purport or intent of this amendment.

Mr. ANDRESEN. The gentleman has a provision there that no one under 16 years of age can work on a farm.

Mr. KVALE. That is under employment conditions. That does not apply. The gentleman is facetious, I am sure.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. JONES. No, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cox). The amendment is subject to a point of order. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. (a) Subsection (a) of section 9 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by striking out all of the second sentence preceding the semicolon and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "When the Secretary of Agriculture determines that any one or more payments authorized to be made under section 8 are to be made with respect to any basic agricultural commodity, he shall proclaim such determination, and a processing tax shall be in effect with respect to such commodity from the beginning of the marketing year therefor next following the date of such proclamation."

(b) The eighth sentence of such subsection (a) is amended by striking out "rental or benefit payments" and inserting in lieu thereof: "all payments authorized under section 8 which are in effect."

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WIGGLESWORTH: On page 29, line 21, after the word "proclamation", strike out the period, insert a colon and the words "Provided, That in lieu of any processing tax in respect to cotton there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated such sums as may be required for the payment of such a tax."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane. This is a tax section, and an appropriation in lieu thereof would not be germane.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, this is not an appropriation. This is an authorization.

Mr. JONES. But it is subject to the same point of order, Mr. Chairman. It is not germane to the text.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is clearly in order, because we are treating of processing taxes, and this simply provides how that payment shall be made. I think it is clearly within the subject under consideration.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. There are other exceptions made in the same paragraph of the original act.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] wish to be heard further?

Mr. JONES. This is a tax provision authorizing taxes to be made under certain circumstances. An authorization for an appropriation is an entirely different subject matter from a tax for a particular purpose.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, all these processing taxes go into the Federal Treasury, and are therefore a matter of authorization eventually.

Mr. JONES. That is right; but one is a tax measure and the other is an appropriation.

I think we would save time if I withdrew the point of order, Mr. Chairman. In order to save time I will withdraw the point of order, and we can vote on the amendment.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 11 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this amendment speaks for itself, I think. It is offered with a view to removing the burden imposed on a single industry by the proposed processing tax on cotton and to obtaining the desired funds out of the general revenues of the Treasury. It is offered with a view to removing the burden of the tax from the shoulders of an industry which finds it extremely difficult at this time to meet that burden and which by its nature would seem to me to make the imposition of a processing tax contrary to the best interests of the Nation as a whole.

If the Members of the House could see at close range the conditions by which this industry represented by hundreds of organizations and hundreds of thousands of workers and their families in both the North and the South is confronted at this time, I am sure they would be sympathetic with the purpose of this amendment.

The cotton-goods industry, one of the oldest and largest industries in the Nation, has been fighting for self-preservation. The foreign market for cotton goods measured in exports has been radically curtailed. Other nations are planning to take our place. The domestic market has been subjected to foreign importations which have been rapidly increasing. Plant after plant has closed. Hundreds of thousands of spindles have ceased operation. Thousands of workers of the textile industry have been added to the rolls of the unemployed since the first of the year.

The situation is, of course, the result of various factors. One of these factors, and a material factor in the overwhelming opinion of those primarily concerned, has been the processing tax imposed 2 years ago under the present administration.

The tax, insofar as this industry is concerned, has meant an added burden on the industry amounting to some $200,000,000. With certain exceptions, it appears to have been out of the question to pass this burden on to the consumer. Those qualified to speak from actual experience advise me that the people of the country have not been given a fair picture in statements emanating from the Department of Agriculture. They advise me that the processing tax has amounted to from 8½ to 17½ percent of the total cost of various classes of finished goods based on N. R. A. prices. These figures are in respect to articles used by the great bulk of the population.

We should not lose sight of the nature of the cotton industry. In normal times no less than 50 percent of the cotton produced in America is placed in a foreign market. The inevitable tendency of the processing tax, as I see it, is to destroy that market by making it available to producers in other countries to the permanent detriment of hundreds of thousands of American workers and their families.

The road to reemployment is the road that leads through the preservation and encouragement of legitimate enterprise throughout the Nation. The adoption of this amendment would be a step in that direction. It would remove a burden from the shoulders of a single industry and its workers, suffering severely at this time. It would place it insofar as it is justified in the interest of the producers of the country squarely on the general revenues of the Treasury. This is where it belongs in all fairness.

I urge the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think the House will recognize that the amendment just offered has been the burden of my argument for some time, and I trust that it will be considered seriously. It is quite evident that the chairman of the committee seems to think that 11 minutes was sufficient for the consideration of this amendment, 10 minutes to the proponents and but 1 minute necessary to defeat it. In this act you have taken $100,000 from the Treasury to pay administration expenses and benefit payments, and you change it now to make the $100,000 available for any part of section 8. Two hundred thousand dollars is provided for the dairy and beef-cattle industry. They could not seem to bear the processing tax and you take the money from the General Treasury.

We have been unable to bear this tax in the cotton industry. We come to you with all the evidence of the last few weeks that has been presented and ask that an appropriation of less than $200,000,000 be made and take the processing tax off cotton.

The processing tax largely caused our recent troubles. It was piled on the already added burden of N. R. A. and its codes. It was the last weight and is responsible for this situation in the cotton industry. The manufacturers have proven their case. It is a proper request that you help cotton just as you help the beef industry and the dairy industry. I think it is a perfectly fair request and ought to be more seriously considered than apparently is intended.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. There is 1 minute remaining.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, how much time does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Under the circumstances I shall ask for but 2 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for 2 minutes and that I, following him, may proceed for 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I spoke yesterday at lenth upon this subject and consequently will be brief at this time. There are very good reasons why we should treat cotton in accordance with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH]. At the present time a commission appointed by the President is investigating the entire cotton situation, but its report is not available. In order that President Roosevelt and Secretary Wallace may keep faith with the cotton industry we should delay action on the extension of the cotton processing tax. Why pronounce judgment before the jury gives the report? It is preposterous and decidedly unfair.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Are the cotton processors unable to pass the processing tax on to the consuming public?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. That is the point; that is where cotton is different from other commodities.

Mr. ANDRESEN. They are not able to pass the processing tax on?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Not in most instances. There are times when the manufacturer of novelties or specialties can control the selling price and thus be able to pass the tax on. In a majority of instances the manufacturers of cotton goods in the South and New England cannot pass it along. The competition both at home and abroad is too keen. The burden, therefore, falls heavily upon the cotton spinning industry. If this tax continues as at present only drab days are ahead for the people who find employment in this industry.

Give the cotton grower his aid, but do not destroy an industry in giving that aid. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this amendment to strike out the processing tax on cotton and authorize an appropriation from the Treasury is not feasible and should be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 19, noes 87.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. Subsection (b) of section 9 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"TAX RATE GENERALLY

"(b) (1) The processing tax shall be at such rate as equals the difference between the current average farm price for the commodity and the fair exchange value of the commodity, plus such percentage of such difference, not to exceed 20 percent, as the Secretary of Agriculture may determine will result in the collection, in any marketing year with respect to which such rate of tax may be in effect pursuant to the provisions of this title, of an amount of tax equal to (A) the amount of credits or refunds which he estimates will be allowed or made during such period pursuant to section 15 (c) with respect to the commodity and (B) the amount of tax which he estimates would have been collected during such period upon all processings of such commodity which are exempt from tax by reason of the fact that such processings are done by or for a State, or a political subdivision or an institution thereof, had such processings been subject to tax. If, prior to the time the tax takes effect, or at any time thereafter, the Secretary has reason to believe that the tax at such rate, or at the then existing rate, on the processing of the commodity generally or for any designated use or uses, or on the processing of the commodity in the production of any designated product or products thereof for any designated use or uses, will cause or is causing such reduction in the quantity of the commodity or products thereof domestically consumed as to result in the accumulation of surplus stocks of the commodity or products thereof or in the depression of the farm price of the commodity, then the Secretary shall cause an appropriate investigation to be made, and afford due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties. If thereupon the Secretary determines and proclaims that any such result will occur or is occurring, then the processing tax on the processing of the commodity generally or for any designated use or uses, or on the processing of the commodity in the production of any designated product or products thereof for any designated use or uses, shall be at such lower rate or rates as he determines and proclaims will prevent such accumulation of surplus stocks and depression of the farm price of the commodity, and the tax shall remain during its effective period at such lower rate until the Secretary, after due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties, determines and proclaims that an increase in the rate of such tax will not cause such accumulation of surplus stocks or depression of the farm price of the commodity. Thereafter the processing tax shall be at the highest rate which the Secretary determines will not cause such accumulation of surplus stocks or depression of the farm price of the commodity, but it shall not be higher than the rate provided in the first sentence of this paragraph.

"SPECIFIC TAX RATES

"(2) In the case of wheat, cotton, field corn, hogs, peanuts, tobacco, paper, and jute, and (except as provided in paragraph (6) of this subsection) in the case of sugar cane and sugar beets, the tax on the first domestic processing of the commodity generally or for any particular use, or in the production of any designated product for any designated use, shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid at the rate prescribed by the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture in effect on June 1, 1935, during the period from the date of the adoption of this amendment to December 31, 1937, both dates inclusive.

"SPECIFIC TAX RATE—RICE

"(3) For the period from April 1, 1935, to July 31, 1936, both inclusive, the processing tax with respect to rice shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid at the rate of 1 cent per pound of rough rice.

"ADJUSTMENT OF RATE

"(4) In accordance with the formulae and standards prescribed in this title, (A) any rate of tax prescribed in paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection may be decreased (including a decrease to zero), to prevent an accumulation of surplus stocks of the commodity or the products thereof, to prevent such reduction in the quantity of the commodity or products thereof domestically consumed as will result in the accumulation of surplus stocks of the commodity or products thereof, or to prevent depression in the farm price of the commodity, or may be increased, or shall terminate pursuant to proclamation as provided in section 9 (a) or pursuant to section 13, and (B) after December 31, 1937 (in the case of the commodities specified in paragraph (2) of this subsection), and after July 31, 1936 (in the case of rice), rates of tax shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and shall thereafter be effective. If the applicability to any person or circumstances of any tax under this title the rate of which is fixed in pursuance of this paragraph is finally held invalid by reason of any provision of the Constitution, or is finally held invalid by reason of the Secretary of Agriculture's exercise or failure to exercise any power conferred on him under this title, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid (in lieu of all rates of tax fixed in pursuance of this paragraph with respect to all tax liabilities incurred under this title on or after the effective date of each of the rates of tax fixed in pursuance of this paragraph, respectively) rates of tax fixed under paragraph (2) or (3) and such rates shall be in effect (unless the particular tax is terminated pursuant to proclamation as provided in section 9 (a) or pursuant to section 13) until altered by act of Congress; except that, for any period prior to the effective date of such holding of invalidity, the amount of tax which represents the difference between tax and the rate fixed in pursuance of this paragraph and tax at the rate fixed under paragraph (2) or (3) shall not be levied, assessed, collected, or paid.

"RICE—SPECIAL RULE

"(5) In the case of rice, the weight to which the rate of tax shall be applied shall be the weight of rough rice when delivered to a processor, except that, where the producer processes his own rice, the weight to which the rate of tax shall be applied shall be the weight of rough rice when delivered to the place of processing.

"SUGAR—SPECIAL RULE

"(6) In the case of sugar beets or sugar cane the rate of tax shall be applied to the direct-consumption sugar, resulting from the first domestic processing, translated into terms of pounds of raw value according to regulations to be issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, and in the event that the Secretary increases or decreases the rate of tax fixed by paragraph (2) of this subsection, pursuant to the provisions of paragraph (4) of this subsection, then the rate of tax to be so applied shall be the higher of the two following quotients: The difference between the current average farm price and the fair exchange value (A) of a ton of sugar beets and (B) of a ton of sugarcane, divided in the case of each commodity by the average extraction therefrom of sugar in terms of pounds of raw value (which average extraction shall be determined from available statistics of the Department of Agriculture); the rate of tax fixed by paragraph (2) of this subsection or adjusted pursuant to the provisions of paragraph (4) of this subsection shall in no event exceed the amount of the reduction by the President on a pound of sugar raw value of the rate of duty in effect on January 1, 1934, under paragraph 501 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as adjusted to the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on December 11, 1902, and/or the provisions of the act of December 17, 1903, chapter 1.

"WHEAT PREMIUMS

"(7) In computing the current average farm price in the case of wheat, premiums paid producers for protein content shall not be taken into account."

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'MALLEY: Under subsection (b) of section 12, on page 32, following the word "paragraph", in line 3, insert the following language:

"In all cases where the commodity subjected to a processing tax is offered for sale there shall be clearly set forth, in whatever manner the Secretary of Agriculture may designate, that proportion of the selling price which constitutes the processing tax on said commodity or commodities under this act. In the case of retail goods this information shall be clearly set forth on a label, tag, stamp, or other suitable indicia accompanying said goods for the protection of the consumer."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin is not germane to this particular section, which has to do with a processing tax. The amendment has to do with the sale of an article and the labels that are to be put on the article sold. The sale of an article is not involved in this particular section.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, this section deals with the levying of a tax and my amendment provides that the proportion of the selling price of the commodities taxed shall be displayed in some way so that the consumer may know how much of the processing tax he is paying and how much of the processing tax is being used as an argument to increase prices. I know that when the processing tax was attached to one food product in my State it amounted to about 2 cents to the consumer, but the producers of that product immediately raised their price 10 cents, so they not only got the processing tax but 8 cents in additional profits.

Mr. Chairman, if the processing tax is a good thing, all the Members who are in favor of it ought to be willing to let the consumer know how much he is paying toward the processing tax. If the processors are taking it out of their profits and the consumers are not paying the processing tax, they do not have to comply with this amendment. Why are we afraid to have the consumer know how much this processing tax is costing him, if it is costing him anything? Why can we not give the consumers some protection, so that the processors are not able to get not only the processing tax but use the processing tax in order to get additional profits? Why cannot the consumer be shown what proportion of the cost of the goods the processing tax involves?

Mr. Chairman, I submit the amendment is clearly in order, because it deals with the method of indicating what the tax is. It is a germane amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, subsection 9 (a) has to do with the levying of the tax. This section simply has to do with the rate of tax. The question of what shall be done in connection with the sale of a commodity is not involved in the particular section now before us, which is section 12 (b).

Mr. O'MALLEY. My amendment only provides for disclosure of the amount of tax to the people who foot the bills.

Mr. JONES. I may say to the gentleman, to put a conversion factor on every one of the infinite variety of commodities that are made from a basic commodity would be practically impossible, because one basic commodity may go into a hundred different finished items. I may say further that the present bill provides that if a false statement is made by a processor as to the amount of the tax in connection with the sale of an article he may be fined, because it then becomes an offense.

Mr. O'MALLEY. A merchant can raise the price and use the processing tax as the basis for the increase. The consumer has no protection. He does not know what percentage the tax is, and he ought to have this information. If the tax is a good thing, we ought to have frankness and decency enough to allow the consumer to know what it is.

Mr. Chairman, this section amends section 9 (a); therefore my amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The portion of the bill just read mentions section 9 (a).

Mr. JONES. Section 9 (a) is treated in this bill on page 29, which we have already considered.

Mr. O'MALLEY. This deals with section 9 (a).

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair is impressed with the view that the point of order made to the amendment offered to this section of the bill is good, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, my amendment does not provide a means for the collection of the tax or regulate the collection in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman goes to the collection of the tax. The amendment specifically provides for the use of stamps which, of course, under the amendment is in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, the method provided is that the Secretary may designate the method, and I only suggested a stamp or a tag as one of the many ways the Secretary might protect the consumer from being gypped.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken and sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section close in 6 minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this is a very important section indeed and bears similarity to other sections in the bill.

It is inconceivable that they would not want more time, but I am willing to confine my remarks now to 5 minutes and take more time on section 21.

I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, after setting forth the contents of this section in 5 minutes, I will agree that 1 minute may be enough for the chairman of the committee to apologize for it. [Laughter.]

Section 12, paragraph 1, taxes generally; and then it states that we will really use the taxes until they are found unconstitutional.

Paragraph 2, with respect to specific tax rates, they contend is so narrow that it will be held constitutional even if the rates are not fair or unnecessary.

On the next page it is provided that if these general rates are held unconstitutional, then they will go back to the special or the specific rates. How hard we are trying to make past legislation constitutional. We are here serving notice that we are to try by every conceivable means to carry out our theories at the risk and apparent expectation of its being held unconstitutional.

This may be the only refuge that the committee could find and, evidently, 1 minute will be all that is required to acknowledge that this is true, but I want to remind you of the situation and compare this section with section 21, a part of which at least ought to be removed from the bill.

Look at section 21, on page 46, and notice the recitation there. It is provided that all the taxes heretofore paid prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment are hereby declared to be legalized, ratified, and confirmed to all intents and purposes as if we had passed the proper legislation in 1933. This is a bold statement to make, but the Supreme Court will regard it of but little value. However, the statement I am interested in, Mr. Chairman, is the one that provides that even though taxes may have been illegally imposed, we will freeze such taxes and we will commit an immoral act, because although it may be proven to be unconstitutional we go still further and say that even if proven unconstitutional we attempt to state that the aggrieved taxpayer may not press his claim in court. They may not even present their case and attempt to recover taxes illegally paid.

Will you not kindly give some consideration to section 21 and help us remove this particular vicious section and let our citizens have their day in court. This is the burden of my argument at the present moment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, under the section referred to the Congress simply enacts the processing fees that are already in effect and makes them the act of Congress in order to avoid any question of delegation. The change the gentleman refers to is an effort to adjust the program to suit a situation that might arise. If the additional flexible power is legal, well and good; but, if not, we certainly cannot afford to wreck the whole farm program, which has meant so much to this country.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. Subsection (c) of section 9 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(c) For the purposes of part 2 of this title, the fair exchange value of a commodity shall be the price therefor that will give the commodity the same purchasing power, with respect to articles farmers buy, as such commodity had during the base period specified in section 2; and, in the case of all commodities where the base period is the pre-war period, August 1909 to July 1914, will also reflect interest payments per acre on farm indebtedness secured by real estate and tax payments per acre on farm real estate, as contrasted with such interest payments and tax payments during said base period; and the current average farm price and the fair exchange value shall be ascertained by the Secretary of Agriculture from available statistics of the Department of Agriculture. The rate of tax upon the processing of any commodity, in effect on the date on which this amendment is adopted, shall not be affected by the adoption of this amendment and shall not be required to be adjusted or altered, unless the Secretary of Agriculture finds that it is necessary to adjust or alter any such rate pursuant to section 9 (a) of this title."

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, if there was no other good that was to come out of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the fact that it has set up for the first time in the history of agriculture a method of cooperation and organization among the farmers such as every other business and industry has in this country that would be justification enough for the act.

Three years ago when the Roosevelt administration came into power agriculture was prostrate. Farm prices and conditions had been going from bad to worse.

For instance, in 1919 there was produced in the State of Kansas 146,109,192 bushels of wheat, which at an average price during that year of $1.99 per bushel resulted in the farmers of the State of Kansas receiving $289,886,360; by 1931 the price had dropped to 34 cents per bushel as an average for the year, and whereas there was 239,907,709 bushels of wheat produced in Kansas that year almost 100,000,000 bushels more than was produced in 1919, yet the farmers of the State of Kansas only received $81,416,717, or more than $200,000,000 less than they received in 1919. The following year, 1932, the average price was 29 cents per bushel, and the farmers of the State of Kansas only received $30,975,880 for their wheat, or approximately one-tenth of what they received in 1919, yet their indebtedness had been increased and their rates of interest had not been lowered.

Take the case of corn in 1917. Kansas produced 106,166,517 bushels of corn, and at a price of $1.14 per bushel received $121,540,410, whereas in 1931 they produced 8,000,000 more bushels of corn than was produced in 1917 and received approximately $90,000,000 less than they received in 1917, or a total of $32,666,554. The prices the farmer received for wheat and corn in 1932 were lower per bushel than any other year before or since 1889, as illustrated by a table compiled from the twenty-seventh biennial report, Kansas State Board of Agriculture, page 538, and data of subsequent years obtained from the board.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert this table of prices of wheat and corn as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table follows:

Mr. CARPENTER. Three years ago when the Roosevelt administration came into power agriculture was prostrate. Farm prices and conditions had been going from bad to worse. Many tears had been shed over the farmer and many promises made to him, but the passage of the Agricultural Adjustment Act was the first time anything had been definitely done for agriculture. To use the expression of the street, and one which is generally understood, it was the Roosevelt administration that brought home the bacon to the farmer. Those who come from agriculture districts are quite well satisfied with the success of the operation of this act. They know what it has meant to agriculture the past 2 years, but as further proof of the success, satisfaction, and appreciation of the farmer was the great spontaneous meeting of over 5,000 farmers from the length and breadth of this land recently held here in Washington. It is generally thought that the farmer never could be satisfied, that he was divided in his own ranks as to what plan should be followed. Never before had such a gathering as was held here in Washington by the actual dirt farmers been dreamed of. They did not come with any demand or complaint, merely to express to this Congress, this administration, and their President their thanks and appreciation of what has been done for them. We can gather from this meeting that they desire the continuation of this act and its strengthening by such amendments as were deemed necessary. Not only did this meeting impress Washington and give the newspapers and other news agencies, who are so prone to picture the farmer under unfavorable circumstances, an idea of what a real farmer looks like, but it had a far greater effect in this country, for there had been conceived by certain persons, whom were those who had promised the farmer much when they were in power, but had failed to keep their promises, a meeting which they dubbed the "grass-roots convention", which was designed and conceived among other things to knock the stuffing out of the A. A. A. To them it was a proposition of "root hog or die", but in the face of this meeting here at Washington and the referendum vote of the farmers throughout the country upon the proposition of continuing this act, those from the short-grass country did not dare carry out the purposes of this meeting. What is the position of the farmer? He has always been one of the most independent individuals in the country. Every other business and industry was seeking special privileges from the Government, but the farmer never asked for any special favor. He was willing to produce by the sweat of his brow and he could export his surpluses abroad and therefore receive a reasonable price for his products.

All he asked was that nothing be done to him, but governments began to increase his taxes. He found himself the victim of the Government's high-tariff program, which resulted in the loss of his markets, and his surpluses were thrown back on him; the Government having done all this to him, it was then up to the Government to do something for him. One thing the farmer desired more than any other class is to remain free and independent. As I have stated, he is for the present Agricultural Adjustment Act, so long as it remains a free and independent plan, but he is opposed to any compulsory plan. He does not desire that the Federal Government, through the Department of Agriculture or any other department, tell him what he can produce or what he cannot produce, and tell him how much he can produce and how much he cannot produce, and I have assurance from the Secretary of Agriculture that there is no such desire on his part.

As I view it, one of the reasons for supporting the present bill containing the A. A. A. amendments, if there was such power of compulsory control in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, as I understand it, it is stricken out under these amendments. Furthermore, under the recent Supreme Court decision any such provision would be void. I believe that the Agriculture Committee is in such close touch with the farmers of this country that they have done a great work in this legislation in protecting agriculture and changing and amending this bill to safeguard the farmer and protect his interests.

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and my colleagues of the House, yesterday I heard a very able speech by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] attacking the Agricultural Adjustment Act amendments, and I happened later in the day to hear the same gentleman in another address on the same subject over the air. The man running the radio tired of the latter speech and turned it off, therefore robbing me of the opportunity to hear the complete speech. Both speeches were along the same line—a wailing lament over the vanishing American foreign markets and a bitter protest against the present agricultural program as being responsible for that waning market.

Some time ago I submitted part of my studies on this situation to the Members of the House. Today in a few brief words I want to add some further comments on the export-import situation. I believe that the gentleman from New York was barking up the wrong tree when he charged that the loss of our foreign markets was the work of the present administration. It is perhaps due to the fact that the charts and figures that I use are not the same as those used by the gentleman from New York that causes my conclusion to be that the agricultural export losses were sustained, to a very large degree, prior to the advent of the present administration. How could we lose what we had already lost?

Without boring you with long tables and charts to show the decline of American agricultural export trade, I am going to present only two or three items of that trade which conclusively show the decline in the pre-Roosevelt era. Take the case of cotton, one of the focal points of attack by the opposition, where the period of 1925 to 1933 shows the trend. In the case of cotton in its unmanufactured state, the values of exports in each of the years from 1925 to 1933 were as follows:

1927	826,306,000
1928	920,008,000
1929	770,830,000
1930	496,798,000
1931	325,667,000
1932	345,164,000
1933	398,212,000

During this same period, unmanufactured cotton exports declined from $1,059,751,000 in 1925 to $45,524,000 in 1932. In simple words, our export values in both of these fields had fallen off to the point where the 1932 valuation was only about one-third of that of 1925. Surely this is a falling export market.

1932	662,400,000	55,200,000	6,600,000	66,900,000	84,900,000	37,700,000	345,200,000	65,900,000

In the year 1925, the total value of all agricultural exports was $2,136,200,000, while in 1932, the total was $662,400,000, a net decrease of $1,473,800,000. Here, too, we see that the American export trade in agricultural products had suffered a tremendous shrinkage. At this point, I wish to insert a table covering the export statistics of all agricultural products by classified groups.

In all of the items in this table, it is seen that the same downward trend is followed as that shown for cotton.

Is it not strange, then, how by some peculiar reasoning so common today, that anyone could reach the conclusion that our agricultural export market has fallen off due to the agricultural program of the present administration.

I am a strong believer in the doctrine of recapturing every possible bit of the foreign market that we can possibly capture. In this present bill, I believe that we have the essential principles necessary for the recovery of the American position in the world market. The fundamentals of the McNary-Haugen measure have been incorporated in these amendments, and they have been harmonized with the whole program.

It is vital to the recovery program that the American farmers reach parity. The man who feeds the country has every right to expect that he will receive for his farm products a price that will justify his continuance as a farmer. The amendments now before us greatly perfect the agricultural program, and they will materially aid the farmers of this country. Our farmers believe in the present program and in the amendments now before us. The interjection of partisan political arguments into this discussion serves only to becloud the real issues. The distortion of facts, facts which in themselves may be quite true, to make them appear as an indictment of the farm program and the amendments, surely cannot be regarded as a legitimate or weighty attack.

There are a great many gentleman in this House who are in the same position as I find myself. They are wholeheartedly in support of the amendments, and none of the blinding figures or false facts which have been set forth thus far can change that belief. Our farmers are in support of these amendments, and the American farmer shall be and will be benefited by this administration and by these amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. Subsection (b) of section 10 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(b) (1) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to establish, for the more effective administration of the functions vested in him by this title, State and local committees, or associations of producers, and to permit cooperative associations of producers, when in his judgment they are qualified to do so, to act as agents of their members and patrons in connection with the distribution of payments authorized to be made under section 8. The Secretary, in the administration of this title, shall accord such recognition and encouragement to producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative associations as will be in harmony with the policy toward cooperative associations set forth in existing acts of Congress, and as will tend to promote efficient methods of marketing and distribution.

"(2) Each order issued by the Secretary under this title shall provide that each handler subject thereto shall pay to any authority or agency established under such order such handler's pro rata share (as approved by the Secretary) of such expenses as the Secretary may find will necessarily be incurred by such authority or agency during any period specified by him for the maintenance and functioning of such authority or agency, other than expenses incurred in receiving, handling, holding, or disposing of any quantity of a commodity received, handled, held, or disposed of by such authority or agency for the benefit or account of persons other than handlers subject to such order. The pro rata share of the expenses payable by a cooperative association of producers shall be computed on the basis of the quantity of the agricultural commodity or product thereof covered by such order which is distributed, processed, or shipped by such cooperative association of producers. Any such authority or agency may maintain in its own name, or in the names of its members, a suit against any handler subject to an order for the collection of such handler's pro rata share of expenses.

The several district courts of the United States are hereby vested with jurisdiction to entertain such suits regardless of the amount in controversy."

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CHANDLER: Amend section 15 by inserting the following sentence at the end of paragraph (b) (1), line 14, page 37: "Such recognition and encouragement under this title shall be limited to associations which deal in the products of nonmembers to an amount not greater in value than such as are handled for their bona fide producer members; and there shall be included in nonmember business all commodities not delivered by persons having a legal or equitable right in the production thereof; all commodities received under any contract which does not give the delivering producer credit for and the right to receive within a reasonable period his pro rata share of profits after deduction of costs and permissible dividends; and all commodities upon which more than 90 percent of the market value is advanced without recourse prior to disposition thereof by the association unless the delivering producer has to his credit with such association reserves sufficient to cover, and liable for any loss incurred in the handling and ultimate disposition of such commodities delivered by him if handled separately, or his pro rata share of any loss incurred in the handling and ultimate disposition of commodities delivered to any pool."

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, when H. R. 8052, the immediate predecessor of H. R. 8492, now under consideration, was introduced, I prepared an amendment along the lines of the one just offered and sent it to the very able and indefatigable Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. JONES]. He informed me, and I think correctly so, that that amendment involved a change in the Capper-Volstead Act. I have redrawn the amendment so as to avoid that criticism and now ask its adoption.

That part of section 15 of the bill, to which this amendment would be added, requires the Secretary of Agriculture to "accord such recognition and encouragement to producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative associations as will be in harmony with the policy toward cooperative associations set forth in existing acts of Congress."

The Capper-Volstead law, which authorizes producers of farm products to form cooperative associations, free from the Antitrust Act, provides that such an association "shall not deal in the products of nonmembers to an amount greater in value than such as are handled by it for members", but, unfortunately, the act does not define nonmember business; and the pending amendment is to make that definition to some small extent for the purposes of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, at least. While the amendment necessarily would have general application, its practical operation would be confined to the cotton trade.

Firstly, it is provided that there shall be included in nonmember business commodities delivered by persons not having any legal or equitable interest in the production of the commodity. This test of producer qualification is the same as that applied in section 3 of the Bankhead Act in permitting votes to determine whether that act should be continued for this season. It permits cotton delivered by landowners, tenants, sharecroppers, and other persons having an actual interest in producing the cotton to be counted as member business, but would not permit ginners and other cotton buyers to sell cotton outright to the cooperatives, and have it called "member cotton." Yet, this is a common practice at the present time.

Secondly, it would class as nonmember business all commodities delivered under any contract which does not give the producer the rights of an actual partner in the profits of the business. This expressly permits, of course, deductions of costs and dividends permitted on capital stock or capital in any other form, but will require any cooperative demanding recognition by the triple A to credit to the farmer his share of the profits, and, if he desires to do so, to permit him to withdraw his profits within some reasonable period. In other words, it will make it impossible for cooperative managers to compel producers against their wishes to invest capital in the cooperative, and yet call their deliveries member business. It will place membership on a voluntary basis, where it certainly ought to be.

Thirdly, this amendment will require cooperatives seeking recognition and encouragement to limit any advances they make on commodities to a reasonable figure, or call such transaction what it actually is, a purchase, and therefore nonmember business. No cooperative asking special favors here ought to be permitted to risk the reserves belonging to its bona fide members, and the funds loaned to it by this Government, in speculating in commodities. Advances of 90 percent of the market value are the maximum which can be made with any degree of safety even on a commodity which can be hedged in the future market such as cotton. All that this clause will require is that the risk of loss on a commodtiy delivered be borne by the delivering producer if he is to be called a member. It prevents cooperative managers from risking reserves of bona fide members and funds borrowed from the Government in what in effect are outright purchases from persons having no interest whatsoever in the continued operations of the cooperative.

This is an amendment in the interest of the farmer, sound cooperative marketing associations, and the independent cotton dealers. For 75 years the independent cotton merchants, whom we may now call "the little fellows", found the outlets at home and abroad for the farmer's cotton, and these people have furnished the competition by which the farmer received the best price obtainable for his product. Now these private business concerns cannot meet the open-market competition of cooperative associations which have become not cooperative organizations but huge merchandising units operating with Federal funds and paying almost no taxes. Soon the farmer will have to put all of his eggs in one basket, and that will be another sad day for him.

The small cotton dealers and their employees, and there are thousands of them in every cotton-growing State, are in a desperate condition because they cannot compete in the open market with the so-called "cooperatives", which have no definite limits on their operations, receive liberal Government credit, and will claim further preferential treatment under this section of the bill. I have been implored by scores of men formerly in the cotton business in my district to help them get other work because their life's occupation is gone. So, we may classify this amendment also as an employment measure.

I do not see how anyone can fairly object to this amendment since all that it does is define in some small degree for the purposes of this act what constitutes membership in a cooperative. The legally operated producer-cooperatives should welcome it, and certainly, Congress is justified in requiring the simplest attributes of membership here laid down, both in protecting producer-cooperatives and public funds, as well as in preventing unfair and destructive competition by Government-financed merchandising organizations which have no real attributes of producer-cooperatives. Surely, membership should entail some right to profits and some burden for losses, or it means nothing more than membership in a night club during the prohibition era.

I sincerely urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, there is no reason why a bona fide cooperative should not be permitted to perform any of these functions for its members. Everyone recognizes that if all the farmers were 100 percent organized on any commodity, they could handle the marketing of that commodity without any legislation. I do not think we should do anything that would prevent cooperatives handling any part of the program they are in a position to handle. That has been the philosophy that has been pursued for some time.

I ask that the amendment be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHANDLER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHANDLER: Amend section 15 (b) (1), on page 37, in line 14, by changing the period to a comma and adding thereafter the following: "but without discrimination against other producers, processors, and handlers."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment. It simply clarifies the matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 29. The Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by adding after section 20 the following new section:

"SEC. 21. (a) No suit or proceeding shall be brought or maintained in, nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by, any court for the recoupment, set-off, refund, or credit of, or on any counterclaim for, any amount of any tax assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment. Except pursuant to a final judgment or decree entered prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment, no recoupment, set-off, refund, or credit of, or counterclaim for, any amount of any tax, interest, or penalty assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment shall be made or allowed. The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to (1) any overpayment of tax which results from an error in the computation of the tax, or (2) duplicate payments of any tax, or (3) any refund or credit under subsection (a) or (c) of section 15 or under section 17.

"(b) No suit, action, or proceeding (including probate, administration, receivership, and bankruptcy proceedings) shall be brought or maintained in any court if such suit, action, or proceeding is for the purpose or has the effect (1) of preventing or restraining the assessment or collection of any tax imposed or the amount of any penalty or interest accrued under this title on or after the date of the adoption of this amendment, or (2) of obtaining a declaratory judgment under the Federal Declaratory Judgments Act in connection with any such tax or such amount of any such interest or penalty. In probate, administration, receivership, bankruptcy, or other similar proceedings, the claim of the United States for any such tax or such amount of any such interest or penalty, in the amount assessed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be allowed and ordered to be paid, but the right to claim the refund or credit thereof and to maintain such claim pursuant to the provisions of law made applicable by section 19 may be reserved in the court's order.

"(c) The taxes imposed under this title, as determined, prescribed, proclaimed, and made effective by the proclamations and certificates of the Secretary of Agriculture and/or of the President by the regulations of the Secretary with the approval of the President prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment, are hereby legalized and ratified, and the assessment, levy, collection, and accrual of all such taxes prior to said date are hereby legalized and ratified and confirmed as fully to all intents and purposes as if each such tax had been made effective and the rate thereof fixed specifically on May 12, 1933, by act of Congress. All such taxes which have accrued and remain unpaid on the date of the adoption of this amendment shall be assessed and collected pursuant to section 19, and to the provisions of law made applicable thereby. Nothing in this section shall be construed to import illegality to any act, determination, proclamation, certificate, or regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture or of the President done or made prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment.

"(d) No refund or credit shall be made or allowed of any amount of any tax which accrued on or after the date of the adoption of this amendment under this title (including any overpayment of such tax), unless (1) the claimant establishes to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, (A) that he has not included such amount in the price of the article with respect to which it was imposed or of any article processed from the commodity with respect to which it was imposed, and that he has not collected from the vendee any part of such amount, or (B) that he has repaid such amount to the producer or the ultimate purchaser of the article, and (C) in the case of hogs that such amount has not been deducted from the price paid to the producer, or (2) the claimant files with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the written consent of such producer and ultimate purchaser to the allowance of the credit or refund. The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to any refund under section 15 (a), section 16, or section 17.

"(e) No refund or credit shall be made or allowed of the amount of any tax, under section 15, section 16, or section 17, unless, within 1 year after the right to such refund or credit has accrued, a claim for such refund or credit (conforming to such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe) is filed by the person entitled to such refund or credit, except that if the right to any such refund or credit accrued prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment, then such 1-year period shall be computed from the date of this amendment. No interest shall be allowed or paid, or included in any judgment, with respect to any such claim for refund or credit.

"(f) The provisions of section 3226, Revised Statutes, as amended, are hereby extended to apply to any suit for the recovery of any amount of any tax which accrued, on or after the date of the adoption of this amendment, under this title, and to any suit for the recovery of any amount of tax which results from an error in the computation of the tax or from duplicate payments of any tax.

"(g) Whenever in this title a refund of any tax is authorized to be made to any person other than the person required to pay the tax with respect to which an application for refund is made, upon statement under oath by the applicant for refund that he has no knowledge, information, or belief that such tax has not in fact been paid, then for the purpose of such refund to said applicant such tax shall be deemed to have been due from and paid by the person liable therefor. Any other provision of the law notwithstanding, the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed, without review of the fact of the payment of the tax, to certify for payment refunds authorized under this subsection in the amounts scheduled to him by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Whoever makes any false statement under oath in connection with applying for or securing such refund of any tax shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 6 months, or both."

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. GIFFORD: Page 44, line 20, strike out Sec. 21 (a).

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment to which I have heretofore referred, wherein any tax that may have been illegally collected prior to the adoption of this act will be frozen, so that a citizen will not be able to go into court and collect it. It may be possible that this act itself is unconstitutional. In fact, the writers of the act, on page 46, section (c), which I will not ask to have stricken out, would seem to think so. There they make another recitation saying, in effect, that all these acts to all intents and purposes shall be just as effective as if we had done it constitutionally in 1933. I do not believe the recitation will amount to much when the Supreme Court looks it over, but you have emphasized it and you also practically say that the Supreme Court must not think, because of the recitation made, that it may carry the import that it might be unconstitutional. That will be found at the bottom of the page:

Nothing here would import or suggest that it would be unconstitutional.

However, I am approaching this from a little different angle. Because you may be wearied of my own arguments, a prominent editorial writer has furnished me with something better than I perhaps could present here as my own statement, to the effect that every other citizen in every other kind of business in the country always adds to his costs, and even though he passes it on—which in this case he has not been able to do—he has had his right to recover. However, even though he has handed it on and afterward it was found that the taxes were illegally collected, certainly it is the right of a citizen to go into court and recover. According to this editorial the processing tax idea is a "fanaticism" in the minds of its proponents, and reason does not prevail. These editorial writers regard this as a most serious matter. Prominent writers are bringing to the attention of the country the fact that this is probably the first time any such attempt has actually been made to retain taxes illegally collected and where a citizen has been deprived of the right even to attempt to recover them.

I hope this amendment will have some serious attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, of course, this is a question that involves processing fees that have been heretofore collected, practically none of which has actually been absorbed by the processor. A serious situation arises with reference to these processing fees. The argument has been made repeatedly by those who have opposed processing fees, that they are either passed back to the farmer in the way of reduced prices or passed on to the consumer in the way of increased prices. Now the argument is made by some gentlemen who oppose them that the price to the consumer is increased so greatly that we cannot afford to have a farm program. If that be true, what excuse could there be for permitting the processor who had not actually absorbed the taxes to recover these great sums?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The statement has been made on the floor several times in the course of this debate, and so far as I know it has not been challenged, that the cotton processing tax is not being passed on to the consumer. I do want to challenge that statement. There has been no proof offered here that it is not being passed on to the consumer.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Is it not true that the statement has always been made that this has been a tax upon clothing? Is that not the statement that has been made?

Mr. HOPE. The opponents of this legislation have urged various reasons in opposition to it. Some of them say it has been a tax on clothing. Now, the gentlemen representing the textile interests say that they cannot pass it on, but I want to call attention to some figures which are contained in the report of the Administrator of the Agricultural Adjustment Act just issued.

These figures show the increase in the price of cotton goods since the processing tax went into effect. It is not pretended, of course, that all of this increase is due to the processing tax, because it includes additional costs due to labor. It includes a higher base price for cotton, but these figures show that a pair of overalls at retail sold on an average at $1.09 on July 27, 1933, before the processing tax went into effect; whereas the average price for the period from November 1933 to November 1934, was $1.56, or an increase of 47 cents. These figures show that sheets 81 by 99 inches in size increased in price from 99 cents to $1.31; that work shirts increased in price from 73 cents to 91 cents; that unbleached muslin per yard increased in price from 10 cents to 14 cents during this period.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman inform the House what percentage of the processing tax collected has gone to the producer?

Mr. HOPE. Of the processing tax collected I would say 95 percent has gone back to the producer—all of it except the cost of administration which, to my best recollection, has not exceeded 5 percent.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do close in 16 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I was very glad to see the Committee on Agriculture include in this bill at page 25 a section with reference to the books and the records of the processors of agricultural products. For some time I have had pending before the Committee on Agriculture several bills with reference to this particular subject matter by which I have sought to amend the existing Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921 in such manner that the Secretary of Agriculture would have access to the books and records of the processors of agricultural products. Consequently, it is a great satisfaction to me to see the Committee on Agriculture include a provision of this type in this particular legislation, even though it is of only a temporary character. I trust it will establish a precedent upon which we may proceed in the future to accomplish the thing I have desired to accomplish for some time.

It should be remembered that notwithstanding the distress we have experienced during the past few years the processors of food products have been able to show a profit substantially higher than other major manufacturing industries in this country while the producers of the products they were processing were going bankrupt on every hand in our farm State of Iowa. This is one of the excellent reasons why the Secretary of Agriculture should have access to the books and records of such concerns. It would then be possible for us to determine the reason for such a strange coincident without additional action by Congress as appears to be necessary at the present time.

I might also suggest at this point that I likewise have pending before a committee of the Congress a resolution asking for a thorough investigation of food processors, the prices they are charging consumers today and the percent of the said consumer's dollar that is reaching the pockets of the producers. With such data before us we could determine the exact status of the American farmer as compared to what it was say a decade or two ago. A similar proposal sponsored by Senator WHEELER has already passed the United States Senate. Action upon my resolution in the House would insure results.

The legislation I have proposed that deals with the inspection of books and records of food processors includes provisions that would simplify the legal procedure now existing with reference to the enforcement of the terms and the provisions of the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921, which is being enforced with great difficulty at the present time. I shall cite to you a recent example in a case in the southern section of the United States resulting from a complaint entered by the Secretary of Agriculture against 12 of the packing industries of this country. They placed on the witness stand approximately 900 witnesses with reference to that particular matter. It was perfectly obvious, from their testimony, that they were doing it with the specific thought in mind of prolonging that case, thereby defeating the purpose of the Secretary of Agriculture from the standpoint of enforcing the provisions of the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921. I trust that after our deliberations upon the pending bill, the Committee on Agriculture and the House of Representatives will consider seriously bills of a character such as I have described briefly today, with reference to giving the Secretary of Agriculture access to the books and records of the packing interests of this country as a permanent policy.

Furthermore, I trust such legislation along this line as may be considered by the Committee on Agriculture will, at the same time, simplify the legal procedure with reference to the enforcement of the act of 1921 in order that we can get some action with reference to the protecion of the public that was intended to be afforded to them in that act.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. In line 7, page 49, strike out the words "shall be guilty of."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair informs the gentleman from Texas that a motion is already pending before the Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, something has been said about our farmers having given up their rights by reason of acts passed by Congress. Today in the United States I believe farmers have more rights than anywhere else in the world. In this country no farmer has given up any rights under any bill Congress has passed except by his own volition, and every right any farmer has given up has been for the benefit of all farmers as a class and, incidentally, for the benefit of the people of the United States, because whenever you affect the interests of the farmer you affect the interests of the people everywhere in our country.

In my mind I have just been comparing the rights of the farmers in this country with the rights of the farmers in Russia. In Russia they are told when to go to bed at night, when to get up in the morning, what they shall do as to farm work during the daytime, and how they shall do it, what they shall do at night, what they shall do for recreation; and after they work hard all day, all week, all month, and all year, most of the product of their industry is taken from them by the Government.

In Russia today you will find hundreds of thousands of farmers absolutely starving to death because their Government has not left them enough food from the products of their own labor to subsist upon.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman something informative to give us on the subject of starving farmers in Russia?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes. I received a letter from a constituent of mine past 70 years of age. He and his aged wife have just lost their home because the Home Owners' Loan Corporation would not assist them. He must submit to an operation next month, and under our Democratic relief plan he receives insufficient subsistence and absolutely no meat. His work order for 1 week included two cans of sardines. Imagine a diet of this kind for an aged person who is to submit to an operation!

Mr. BLANTON. Where is that?

Mr. HOEPPEL. In Los Angeles. I think we ought to pay more attention to our own country, talk less about Russia, and do more for the United States and for our own unfortunate people.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about the American farmer and his rights as compared with the rights of starving farmers in Russia. I do not hesitate to discuss conditions in Russia when Russian Communists have been trying to disrupt the American farmers of the United States.

I do not want to see a condition ever arise in this country where the right of any farmer may be taken from him. I do not want a condition ever to arise in the United States where the Government of the United States may say to a farmer what he shall do, and how he shall do it, and what he shall not do, and where the Government may also say to him: "We will take from you most of the products of your labor."

I do not yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. May I say to the gentleman from California that one thing I did in this session of Congress I am proud of is my amendment that I got passed on the recent District appropriation bill that will prevent another dollar of American money being paid to any teacher in Washington who advocates or teaches communism in the schools in Washington, which read as follows:

That hereafter no part of any appropriation for the public schools shall be available for the payment of the salary of any person teaching or advocating communism.

I got that amendment placed in the bill, and passed, and it is permanent law. No Communist teacher in the schools of Washington, or anybody else connected with our public schools here advocating communism therein will ever be able to get another dollar of salary out of the Federal Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I regret another word seems necessary, but I want to parallel the words made by my good friend the gentleman from Kansas. After all the testimony that has been introduced by our New England Members in reference to the processing tax, I am sorry that our words have not been accepted as facts. Should we have cluttered up the RECORD with the letters and the statements that we have received from our manufacturers? The New England Council received scores of letters from manufacturers stating that they could not pass on this tax. There was one case where the manufacturer testified that after adding all the costs, in order to meet competition he could add only exactly 43 percent of this tax.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman will admit there has been a great increase in the cost of cotton goods?

Mr. GIFFORD. Indeed we admit that.

Mr. HOPE. It has been handed on. There has been a great increase in the retail price as well.

Mr. GIFFORD. It has not been handed on! The only point I make is that the gentleman said we had adduced no proof. The proof we have adduced is contained in pages upon pages that have been submitted to the special Cabinet committee.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman has not produced any proof before the House.

Mr. GIFFORD. I cannot admit any such thing. We have testified here personally day after day. We have scores of letters on our desks which we could have put in the RECORD. These letters have been filed with the Cabinet officers. I do not like the statement that we have not proven our case. I know, and the country knows, that we have proven our case. We could pass on only a portion, and sometimes none, of the processing tax in order to meet competition. The statement is an unfair statement, especially from the very able Member from Kansas, who is usually fair and considerate.

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Chairman, may I direct the attention of the Chairman of the Agricultural Committee and his legal adviser here to page 45, line 1, which states:

The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to (1) any overpayment of tax which results from an error in the computation of the tax, or (2) duplicate payments of any tax, or (3) any refund or credit under subsection (a) or (c) of section 15 or under section 17.

In reference to the computation of the tax, I would like to ascertain from the chairman if that does not also imply an error in the ascertainments or computation of the tax? In other words, suppose an error is made in computing the tax rate. Is that section applicable to an error in computing the tax rate?

Mr. JONES. I doubt whether that would be included. I know what the gentleman is driving at. The trouble in construing it to include that would be that there might be a dispute over the elements which the Secretary considered in making up the rates.

I think any purely mechanical error that might be made in compiling the total tax——

Mr. BEAM. Or any mistake in determining the tax rate applicable to that section would certainly come within the meaning of the section.

Mr. JONES. If it were a mechanical mistake, it would probably be included. An error of law would not be included, because we do not want to put behind these taxes a controversy over whether the Secretary should allow so much consideration to this or so much to that, but if, in making up the tax, he inadvertently used a wrong figure or made a mistake in the compilation, I think such a mechanical or clerical mistake would be included.

Mr. BEAM. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 30. The Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by inserting after section 21 the following:

"IMPORTS

"SEC. 22. (a) Whenever the President has reason to believe that any one or more articles are being imported or are likely to be imported into the United States under such conditions and in sufficient quantities to render ineffective or materially interfere with any program or operation undertaken under this title, he shall cause an immediate investigation to be made by the United States Tariff Commission, which shall give precedence to investigations under this subsection, to determine such facts. Such investigation shall be made after such notice and hearing and subject to such regulations as the President shall specify.

"(b) If, after such investigation and report to him of findings and recommendations made in connection therewith, the President finds the existence of such facts, he shall by order direct that the entry into the United States of such article or articles shall, for such time as may be specified by him, be permitted subject to (1) such terms and conditions, (2) such limitations on the total quantities thereof which may be imported, or (3) the payment of such compensating taxes as he finds necessary to prescribe in order that the entry of such article or articles will not render or tend to render ineffective or materially interfere with such program or operation undertaken under this title. Any compensating tax imposed under this section shall be in addition to any tax imposed under section 15 (e) and the provisions of such section shall apply thereto.

"(c) Any decision of the President as to facts under this section shall be final.

"(d) Upon information of any order of the President under subsection (b), the Secretary of the Treasury shall permit entry of any article or articles specified therein only in conformity with such order.

"(e) After investigation, report, and finding in the manner provided in the case of an original order, any order or provision thereof may be suspended or revoked by the President whenever he finds that the circumstances requiring the order or provision no longer exist, or may be modified by the President whenever he finds that changed circumstances require such modification to carry out the provisions of this section."

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAWFORD: On page 49, strike out lines 15 to 25 inclusive, and on page 50, strike out lines 1 to 17 inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 22. (a) In order to put into force and effect the policy of Congress by this act intended, the United States Tariff Commission (1) upon the request of the President, or (2) upon resolution of either or both Houses of Congress, or (3) upon its own motion, or (4) when in the judgment of the Commission there is good and sufficient reason therefor, upon application of any interested party, shall investigate and find upon such investigation that any one or more articles are being imported or are likely to be imported into the United States under such conditions and in sufficient quantites to render ineffective or materially interfere with any program or operation undertaken by this title, the said United States Tariff Commission shall certify its findings to the President. Such investigation shall take precedence over any investigation authorized by any previous act of Congress.

"(b) Upon the receipt by the President of such certificate issued by the aforesaid Commission, the President shall by order direct that the entry into the United States of such article or articles shall, for such a time as may be specified by him, be permitted subject to (1) such terms and conditions, (2) such limitations on the total quantities thereof which may be imported, or (3) the payment of such compensating taxes as he finds necessary to prescribe in order that the entry of such article will not render or tend to render ineffective or materially interfere with such program or operations undertaken under this title. Any compensating tax under this section shall be in addition to any tax imposed under section 15 (e) and the provisions shall apply thereto."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, every Member of this House knows the concern there is throughout the country today, particularly in the farming sections, caused by the importation of foreign-produced farm goods coming into this country at a time when, through one means or another, the production of farm goods is being held down and acreage is being retired in the United States.

I think, perhaps, if this one objection to the triple A was eliminated there would be a great deal more satisfaction than at the present time. This would remove a great many of the complaints which people have against the triple A; but so long as we do decrease production in this country and at the same time bring in these staggering imports from other parts of the world, there will be a tremendous amount of justifiable opposition to the operations of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Section 30, as set forth in this bill, in my opinion, has three very distinctly weak provisions.

One is that when the President has to arrive at such a decision he will have pressure from the reciprocal trade agreement countries pushing on one side and pressure from the producers of such goods in this country pushing on the other, and as between these two forces he must have a reason.

The second point is that the United States Tariff Commission, which is supposed to be a nonpartisan commission, and which is supposed to have power to act without operating under duress or restraint imposed by the President, as set forth in the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Humphrey case, must as set forth here carry on the investigation under such regulations as the President shall specify. I think therein is a very weak part of this section, and I think it imposes a responsibility on the President which he should not be forced to carry.

I believe this will subject the President to tremendous criticism, and I do not see how he can satisfactorily administer this particular section if he is to set forth the regulations under which the Tariff Commission is to act.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. I may suggest to the gentleman that the reason for that is to facilitate matters, it being felt by those who proposed this amendment that if the Tariff Commission operated under their usual methods it would take too long, and therefore the desired results would not be accomplished.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In answer to that statement, I may say that my amendment provides that such an investigation as would come about through this section would take precedence over any other investigation authorized by any previous act of Congress. This would leave the Tariff Commission free to act and carry on its investigation and determine the facts and certify these facts without any pressure from the President.

The third point I wish to bring out with reference to section 30 is that the decision of the President as to the facts under this section shall be final. Let the Tariff Commission determine the facts. Let it be an impartial investigation. Let Congress—either or both Houses have the right to initiate these highly important investigations in these peculiar times of crop reduction when so many people are going hungry—initiate the investigation by passing resolutions to the effect that the Commission shall make them and certify the facts to the President for prompt action. Let those who are being driven out of production, whether it be the processor or the farmer, have the right to appeal to the Tariff Commission to proceed with an investigation for a determination of the facts. Let the Tariff Commission have the right, under its own motion, to make an investigation if it feels that a sufficient quantity of goods are coming in to defeat the intent of Congress as set forth under the provisions of this act. Finally, let there be impartial investigations, nonpartisan investigations, which are the only kind the Commission should make. The Supreme Court has held that the Chief Executive shall not discharge members of the Tariff Commission simply because they do not agree with the tariff and trade policies of the President. Yet if we leave section 30 of the bill as it is now presented to us, we provide a means whereby the President can circumvent the Supreme Court decision and even issue the regulations whereby and whereunder the Commission shall be forced to act. That is not fair to the farm people of this country who are cooperating with the administration in this reduction program. It is not fair to the American people who contribute money in the form of processing taxes all to the end benefit payments may be made for the reduction of the production of food, clothing, and shelter. The enactment of such a provision in this bill, which purports to be in the interest of the American farmer, cannot be justified or successfully defended. Mr. Chairman, I hope the chairman of the committee will accept this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein some official figures.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I believe that no person who loves individual liberty can examine the provisions of H. R. 8492—the purpose of which is to vest larger powers of regimentation in the Secretary of Agriculture than he now has under the Agricultural Adjustment Act—without a feeling of apprehension as to the wisdom of the proposed measure.

Almost every section and paragraph of the bill reeks with arbitrary regulations, licenses, pains, forfeitures, fines, and penalties. The poison in these legislative pills is sugarcoated with promises of bonuses, subventions, and a more abundant life to make them palatable until the drug has time to paralyze the victim.

The arbitrary powers under the A. A. A. sought to be vested in the Secretary of Agriculture and the still greater powers the amendments seek to confer upon him invite attention to the record of the official who is to wield these powers. The inflammatory character of the speeches, the propaganda machinery set in motion to mobilize the hatred of class against class by the official who is to administer such arbitrary and sweeping powers under the A. A. A. and under the amendments here proposed ought not to be ignored by those who legislate.

The statements made by the Secretary of Agriculture during his tour of New England, and the misleading and inflammatory statements recently made by him in his speech at Peoria, Ill., are not such as to inspire confidence in his leadership.

The farmers of this Nation, the great rank and file of them, are practical men, fair and honest, and they know that impractical leadership in the affairs of agriculture will in the long run mean disaster to their interests, not success.

To be more specific, what is the record of the Secretary of Agriculture as a formulator of policies and as a practical leader in the field of agriculture? Some very pertinent facts bearing on this point were recently stressed in a radio speech delivered on May 5, 1935, by Dr. G. W. Dyer, professor of economics, Vanderbilt University. Discussing the condition of the farmers in the Southern States, as revealed by authentic official statistics, he said:

> There were 1,112,834 farms in the Southern States in 1930 that were operated by full owners. Of this number, only 328,773 were mortgaged. In the Southern States 784,773 farms were absolutely free of mortgages. * * * Less than 28 percent of the farms operated by full owners in the Southern States carry any mortgages at all. Over 78 percent of the farms of Virginia operated by owners are free of mortgage.

Professor Dyer then points out the conditions in Iowa, the home State of the man whom it is proposed to clothe with dictatorial powers to lead the farmers to economic salvation. Here is what he says:

> The farm mortgage indebtedness of Iowa is greater than that of all the Southern States combined, with Texas excluded. In the State of Iowa, where Mr. Wallace has been a conspicuous leader in agricultural policies, farm mortgage indebtedness increased over $285,000,000 between 1910 and 1920. This was an increase of 132 percent; yet this was the period of great agricultural prosperity.

The farmers of New York State have received insignificant benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. This has been openly and frankly admitted by one of the A. A. A. officials, Mr. Chester Davis. Viewed from the angle of the cost of living resulting from the imposition of processing taxes upon the necessities of life, A. A. A. has been highly injurious to the farmers and all other consumers in New York State.

Official figures clearly demonstrate that the purpose and practical effect of the operation of the law is to collect processing taxes in one section of the country and distribute the money so collected to other sections. There had been collected in processing taxes under the A. A. A. from the taxpayers in New York State up to April 30, 1935, a total of $89,528,119.86. The total rental and benefits paid to the farmers of New York State during the same period amounted, all told, to $384,519.82.

Broken down as to commodities, $66,696.24 was paid to farmers in my State for not raising wheat; $67,384.91 was paid to the farmers for not raising tobacco; and $250,438.67 for not raising corn and hogs.

The story of Iowa, the home State of the Secretary of Agriculture, presents a very different picture. The taxpayers of the State of Iowa paid in processing taxes during the same period $27,837,138.47. Rentals and benefits paid to the farmers covering the same period amounted to $70,376,519.14.

The official records of the A. A. A. show that in nine counties of Iowa up to April 30, 1935, the farmers had received in rental and benefits more than $1,000,000 each or an actual aggregate sum for the nine counties of $11,550,173.44.

I respectfully submit two schedules furnished by the Agricultural Department showing the benefits paid to farmers in the State of Iowa and the State of New York, respectively:

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I present a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 51, line 4, after the word "section", insert: "Provided, however, That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that a surplus of any agricultural product or products exists in the United States he shall so certify to the President, and thereupon the President shall by order direct that no such product or products shall be imported into the United States so long as such surplus exists. Such order may be suspended or revoked by the President upon certification by the Secretary of Agriculture that such surplus no longer exists."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman that he does not think that that is a substitute for the pending amendment, but is an amendment to the section.

Mr. MOTT. Very well. I will offer it as an amendment to the section.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is so plain and simple that I feel that it explains itself.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I am sorry I cannot yield, but I have only 3 minutes. This amendment leaves section 30 as it is. The discretionary authority granted the President by section 30 is still there if he wants to use it. Gentlemen who think the President will use that discretion or authority ought to be satisfied on that score, because this amendment does not interfere with it.

This amendment, however, goes on and says that whenever the Secretary of Agriculture finds that there is a surplus in any agricultural commodity in the United States he shall certify that fact to the President, and the President thereupon shall by order prohibit the importation of that commodity into the United States so long as that surplus exists.

Now, many gentlemen on both sides of the aisle have stated at various times that they want regulation that will keep foreign agricultural products out of this country altogether when our own farmers are producing more of those commodities than they can sell. I speak to the Republicans who time after time have expressed their opinion on that point. If they want tariff protection that will really protect, if they want regulation that will effectively give the American market to American farmers, let them vote for my amendment. Gentlemen who believe that agricultural commodities in this country of which we produce a surplus should be protected entirely from foreign importations, should vote for this amendment, whether they be Democrats or Republicans. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. HULL. No; it is an amendment to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman to withhold his amendment until the pending amendment is disposed of. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, just a word on that. I hope the House will vote down these amendments. This is a very fine provision as it stands now, under which something may be accomplished. It is not customary in legislation to give directions to the Chief Executive. I think we would be in danger of losing the whole power if the wishes of these gentlemen who want to make it different should prevail. They are somewhat in the position of the dog in Æsop's Fables. Having a piece of meat in his mouth, he saw the shadow of it in the water, and grabbed for what he thought was the better piece of meat and lost it all. This is a good provision if adopted and it can be made very effective. I hope the House will vote down the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and there were on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts)—ayes 51, noes 111.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon offers an amendment which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk again reported the Mott amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlemen from Oregon.

The question was taken; and there were on a division (demanded by Mr. MOTT)—ayes 52, noes 110.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WITHROW: Page 49, line 20, after the comma, insert the following, "or if the domestic price is below the fair exchange value."

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply concerned with the welfare of the dairy farmer because the welfare of the State of Wisconsin is largely dependent on the welfare of our dairy industry. For the past several years dairy farmers have suffered severely because they have been unable to secure a parity price for dairy products. It is true that during the past several months prices paid to farmers for dairy products have increased, but the farm prices are still below parity and it is obvious that dairy farmers, already faced with bankruptcy, cannot continue indefinitely with prices which do not cover the cost of production.

Because of this very serious situation many representatives of the dairy farmer have come to Washington during the past year to ask that something be done to relieve the dairy farmer. These representatives of the dairy farmers, together with various Members of the House have presented their case before numerous agencies of the Government, only to find that a deaf ear has been turned to their pleas.

The improvement in dairy prices which has occurred has been almost entirely the result of weather conditions and the operations of nature rather than the result of any activity on the part of the various agencies of the Federal Government.

One of the most urgent requests which has been made by the dairy farmers is that they be protected from the competition of foreign imports. At this point let me say that while the activities of the A. A. A. have not helped dairy farmers, they have very materially increased the cost of supplies which dairy farmers must buy and have therefore actually increased the cost of production of dairy products. This fact makes it even more important that protection be afforded against foreign imports.

Despite the fact that butter is now being imported into this country at a price below the domestic cost of production, representatives of the dairy farmers found that the President was unwilling to utilize his power to increase the tariff on butter. I believe that the committee is sincere in its desire to protect our domestic dairy farmers from low-cost foreign imports, and I know that it is the intention of Congress to promote the welfare of our domestic dairy farmers. I do not believe, however, that we will accomplish this purpose by enacting the permissive provisions contained in this bill. It is true that these provisions might work to the advantage of dairy farmers if we could be assured that they would be properly and sympathetically administered, but our experience has been that it has been impossible to secure action under previous permissive legislation very similar to that contained in the committee amendment and I am not optimistic enough to believe that a mere reenactment of what is virtually the present law, will materially benefit dairy farmers.

I am therefore proposing an amendment which makes it mandatory that the President shall take action to prevent importations whenever the domestic price of any farm product falls below a fair exchange value.

My amendment would apply not only to butter but to other dairy products as well and includes all other agricultural products which enter into competition with dairy products.

During the first 2 months of this year the importation of butter into this country has increased more than 20 times over importation during a similar period last year. This rapidly increasing volume of importation, together with the fact that we are approaching the peak of our domestic production season, makes it imperative that action be taken immediately if we are to protect our domestic dairy farmer and the domestic butter market.

It is imperative that action be taken to assure to farmers a parity price for dairy products. I realize that protection from foreign competition alone will not accomplish this purpose, but it is certain that without effective protection from foreign competition, such as would be provided by my amendment, it will never be possible to establish or maintain a parity price in this country.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to insert a table which has been prepared by the Department of Agriculture showing the prices which were actually paid to farmers and the prices farmers should have received during the same period in order to give them a parity price. A comparison of these two prices will show you that farmers have been selling every pound of butterfat at an actual loss; that farmers have been forced to sell their product at a price below the actual cost of production.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. WITHROW. There is no justice, gentlemen, in permitting the importation of dairy products when such importation drives into bankruptcy one of the principal branches of our agricultural industry, the dairy farmers.

If we are sincere in our desire to benefit the dairy farmers, then let us do it effectively by the method which is proposed by the amendment which I have introduced. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, if that amendment were adopted, we would have the President investigating so much all of the time that he would not have time to take action, because he would have to investigate every time the price of a commodity went below parity.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL: Page 50, line 15, after the word "thereto", insert a comma and the words "and shall be not less than the difference between the cost of production in any foreign country and the cost of production in this country."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to provide that the compensating tax which the President may levy under subsection (b) of this section cannot be less than the difference between the cost of production in our country and the cost of production in any foreign country.

Some 5 years ago there was presented to the Tariff Commission on behalf of Wisconsin dairymen a petition for a revision of the tariff and investigation of the cost of production at home and abroad. That petition is still unacted upon.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. Does not the gentleman think that that requirement will necessarily slow up any action, because it will require the Tariff Commission to make studies abroad, and it would delay action to such an extent as to make it ineffective?

Mr. HULL. Oh, they have compiled much information on this same question. They have issued reports on it. All I am asking is that we in the Northwest may have that kind of protection which we need against the introduction of dairy products from countries like the Argentine, New Zealand, and Australia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL] has expired.

All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WITHROW: On page 51, line 4, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no importation of any dairy product or other agricultural product which enters into competition with any dairy product shall be permitted unless application is made to the President. Upon receipt of such application for permit to import a dairy product or other agricultural product which enters into competition with any dairy product the President may issue a permit for such importation if he finds that such importation will not render the domestic dairy program or policy ineffective or materially ineffective. Violation of this provision by any person or corporation shall be punishable by a fine not to exceed $10,000 for each offense. This provision shall not be construed to prevent the levying of a tax on any dairy product or other agricultural product which enters into competition with any dairy product upon which permit to import has been granted by the President."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 31. There is authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year an amount equal to 30 percent of the gross receipts from duties collected under the customs laws during the period January 1 to December 31, both inclusive, preceding the beginning of such fiscal year. Sums appropriated in pursuance of such authorization shall be maintained in a separate fund and shall be used by the Secretary of Agriculture only to: (1) Encourage the exportation of major agricultural commodities and products thereof by the payment of benefits in connection with the exportation thereof or of indemnities for losses incurred in connection with such exportation, (2) encourage the domestic consumption of such commodities or products by diverting them, by the payment of benefits or indemnities or by other means, from the normal channels of trade and commerce; (3) purchase or lease, on behalf of the United States, submarginal agricultural and grazing lands; and (4) finance adjustments in the quantity planted or produced for market of agricultural commodities. The amounts appropriated in pursuance of this section shall be expended for such of the above-specified purposes, and at such times, in such manner, and in such amounts as the Secretary of Agriculture finds will tend to eliminate unprofitable agricultural and grazing lands, bring about the utilization of only such lands as can be profitably utilized, increase the exportation of agricultural commodities and products thereof, and increase the domestic consumption of agricultural commodities and products thereof: Provided, That no part of the funds authorized to be appropriated by this section shall be expended pursuant to (3) or (4) hereof unless the Secretary of Agriculture determines that the expenditure of such part pursuant to clauses (1) and (2) is not necessary to effectuate the purposes of this section.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section close in 6 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call to the attention of the House the great need of assisting in the exportation of domestic wheat and wheat flour. The wheat harvest is now on, and the cash wheat market has dropped nearly 25 cents per bushel in the last 60 days. When the reciprocal trade agreement law was enacted last spring our people had great hopes that agreements would be negotiated with other countries, particularly with those that have been good markets for our wheat flour, which would permit mills and wheat growers in the United States to recover a substantial portion of the business they have lost since 1929, but instead of relief, here is what has happened: In every reciprocal trade agreement so far concluded wheat flour milled in bond has been classed as a United States product. This flour, milled from Canadian wheat, which has not paid the 42 cents per bushel duty, was used as a United States product because it was a product of industry. The State Department has been willing to accept this wheat flour in these agreements as though it were manufactured from wheat produced in the United States.

From January 1 to April 1, 1935, exports of flour amounted to 199,355 bushels of wheat, of which 30,668 bushels were milled wholly from United States wheat, and 168,687 bushels were milled from other wheat; or, in other words, 85 percent of our flour exports was from wheat milled in bond furnished by Canada. Trade agreements have been concluded with Belgium, Brazil, and Haiti, but no concessions in the duties on wheat or wheat flour were obtained in any of the agreements.

It is unfortunate that under our present laws flour milled in bond from imported wheat when exported from other nations is treated by our Government the same as flour milled from wheat grown in the United States. This is due to the language that appears in the trade-agreement law and also in the various trade agreements which have been negotiated.

This question was recently brought to the attention of wheat growers and millers when our reciprocal trade agreement was entered into with Haiti. Haiti has a law which doubles the import duty on articles imported from nations which purchase less than 1 percent of the Haitian exports during a 2-year period. Canada, buying less than 1 percent of the Haitian exports, found its flour with 100-percent increase in duty, but flour milled in bond at Buffalo from imported wheat was held by our State Department to be entitled to the duty allowed United States flour, which enjoyed the regular basis. Many of us had the question up with the State Department, trying to get them to hold that bonded flour should not be entitled to greater privileges than Canadian flour, since such flour, if raised in the United States, would have to pay a duty to our Government, but the State Department turned us down.

The millers are greatly concerned because they feel no reduction of any consequence will be secured in any of the reciprocal trade agreements. Likewise the wheat producers are seriously disturbed because they are getting no relief through the trade agreements. Some months ago an agreement with Cuba was concluded and this contains substantial concessions on the import duty on wheat flour and naturally the millers and wheat growers believe other similar agreements should be developed.

The total flour exports from the United States have declined from 13,663,000 barrels in 1929 to 4,165,000 barrels in 1934. The flour exports milled from wheat grown in the United States have declined from 10,644,000 barrels to 1,793,000 barrels in 1934. This shows a startling decline in this period. In 1929 only 22 percent of our flour exports from the United States were milled in bond from Canadian wheat, but in 1934, 57 percent of our total flour exports were milled in bond. I want to call attention to the serious reduction in wheat exports to various countries.

Formerly the Netherlands and the United Kingdom were our best markets. In 1930 we exported 1,473,000 barrels of flour to the Netherlands, but in 1934 only 81,000 barrels. Our flour exports to the United Kingdom in 1930 amounted to 1,536,000 barrels, and only 66,000 barrels in 1934. For many years Brazil was one of the important markets for flour produced in the United States. In 1930 our flour exports to Brazil amounted to 849,000 barrels; in 1934 they were 160,000 barrels. Our flour exports to Denmark in 1930 amounted to 571,000 barrels, but in 1934 we exported only 33,000 barrels. In 1930 we exported 350,000 barrels to Norway, and in 1934, 147,000 barrels. Finland imported 375,000 barrels from the United States in 1930 and only 14,000 barrels in 1934. These examples are merely typical of the fearful decline in our flour exports. This constant decline in the flour production means a corresponding decline in the volume of wheat required for milling purposes.

In 1929 approximately 529,000,000 bushels of wheat were used in the production of flour. By 1934 the amount of wheat consumed in the production of flour declined to 447,000,000 bushels, representing a milling loss of more than 82,000,000 bushels of wheat.

As a representative of one of the great wheat-producing districts of the United States, I want to protest the use of wheat flour milled in bond from Canadian wheat as a United States product in making reciprocal trade agreements. With the passage of this act it is my hope that the State Department will try and secure tariff concessions in order that wheat growers of the United States might receive some benefits from reciprocal trade agreements. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SAUTHOFF: Page 51, line 23, after the word "commodities" and the period, add the following: "None of the lands affected under the provisions of section 31 shall be used for creating any agricultural product within the purview of this act."

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering that amendment is this, that no producer shall receive pay from the Government for taking his acreage out of production and shall then be permitted to transfer it into pasturage on which he can raise sheep, beef cattle, or milk cows, and go into the dairy business. For that purpose, inasmuch as he is paid to take that acreage out of production, in fairness to the other farmers of the Nation he ought not be allowed to go into competition with them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that would accomplish the purpose. That is covered by the main features of the Agricultural Act.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia moves to amend H. R. 8492 by adding new sections at the end of section 33, as follows:

"SEC. 34. The Secretary of the Interior, through the General Land Office, is hereby authorized—

"(a) To purchase any and/or all obligations secured by liens on farm lands, paying for the same an amount not exceeding the normal value of such lands plus the useful value of buildings and improvements thereon.

"(b) To settle and liquidate all obligations acquired under this act where the mortgagor is still in possession of such lands and where the total normal value of the lands plus the useful value of the buildings and improvements thereon exceeds the total encumbrances thereon, in the following manner: The mortgagor shall be permitted to retain of the mortgaged lands, free of any such obligation, an amount of the land involved which will equal in value to the difference between (1) the total normal value of the total lands encumbered plus the useful value of buildings and improvements thereon and (2) the total amount of the encumbrances. Such settlement shall be made in such manner as will vest in the General Land Office fee-simple title and possession to the remainder of such lands.

"(c) To recognize the right of every mortgagor to carry out the provisions of his obligation, and upon receipt from such mortgagor of complete payment of his obligation and satisfaction of indebtedness according to the terms of his contract, to cancel such obligation and convey it back to the mortgagor.

"SEC. 35. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to purchase fee-simple title to any and/or all farm lands held by the mortgagee or lienholder under a foreclosure concluded after January 1, 1920, paying for the same an amount not exceeding the normal value of such lands plus the useful value of buildings and improvements thereon and not exceeding the amount of indebtedness under the mortgage or other lien at the time of foreclosure.

"SEC. 36. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed—

"(a) To make all lands coming into possession of the General Land Office under this act a part of the public domain.

"(b) To classify all lands in the public domain according to their fertility, adaptability, and usefulness for farm purposes.

"(c) To withhold and retain from private ownership all the public domain not suited for farm purposes.

"(d) To divide all public lands suitable for farm purposes into tracts, to be known as 'homesteads', of suitable size for the support of a family of average size under normal conditions, taking into consideration the fertility of the soil and general farm conditions and requirements in the section where said lands are located in determining the size of such tracts.

"SEC. 37. The Secretary of the Interior, through the General Land Office, is hereby authorized and directed to grant homesteads provided for in this act to any person who is the head of a family, subject to the following terms and conditions:

"(a) The applicant must have met the general requirements of the homestead acts now in force, not inconsistent with this act, before homestead under this act may be granted.

"(b) Preference must be given to farm families living on farms at the time this act goes into effect—a prior right in mortgagors living on encumbered lands at the time of liquidation of indebtedness to acquire homestead within the bounds of said encumbered lands shall be recognized as a fundamental policy of this act.

"SEC. 38. (a) Homestead grants shall include only the rights of possession and use of the lands included in such homestead tract, but such rights shall be just as full and complete as though the lands were held under fee simple title.

"(b) The Secretary of the Interior shall provide regulations whereby homestead grants provided for in this act may be exchanged.

"(c) No person shall be permitted, at any given time, to have title to more than one homestead tract under this act.

"(d) No person who is the owner of farm land shall be granted a homestead under this act.

"(e) Authority to sell, encumber, or in any manner make such homestead tract subject to any debt shall not be granted and is hereby prohibited as a fundamental policy of this act, and any exercise of or attempt to exercise any such power is hereby declared to be void and of no legal effect.

"(f) Homestead grants, under this act, shall be free except that a nominal registration fee of not exceeding $10 may be charged.

"SEC. 39. (a) The laws, including those relating to taxation, of any State or political subdivision in which any lands coming into the possession of the Secretary of the Interior under the terms of this act are situated shall apply in the case of such lands in the same manner and to the same extent as such laws apply in the case of privately owned lands.

"(b) Upon failure of any owner of homestead grant under this act to meet all such obligations on the lands held under such homestead grant, his rights under said grant shall be forfeited and shall revert to the General Land Office, and said Office shall have power to eject the owner from possession and repossess such lands, making them again eligible for entry by other qualified applicants under this act.

"SEC. 40. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, from time to time, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and intent of this act."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides that the farmers, the actual farmers themselves, shall be permitted to enjoy the greatest possible benefits from the other portions of this act or from other similar acts passed by Congress. In my opinion, the amendment is germane to the legislation now before us, because it is in strict harmony with the purpose of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is familiar with the wording of the amendment. While there may be some relationship between the purposes of the amendment and the bill, they are not so close as to make the amendment germane. The pending bill is a production-control measure, whereas the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia deals with an entirely different subject matter.

The amendment is clearly subject to the point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. UTTERBACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. UTTERBACK. Mr. Chairman, this session of Congress has had before it many bills of great importance to the people of the entire Nation, but no bill that has been before this Congress up to the present hour is of greater importance, not only to the people of the agricultural districts of this country but to the people of the entire Nation, than the pending bill amending the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

This bill is important because our agricultural interests want and need the extension of the benefits of the agricultural adjustment program. This bill is important to those representing industrial districts for the simple reason that industry in this Nation cannot prosper, cannot recover, unless the agricultural interests of this country likewise prosper.

Two years and a half ago I saw corn shoveled into the furnaces and stoves of homes and public buildings in the State of Iowa—corn that had been offered for sale or had been sold at 10 cents and less per bushel. Farmers who receive such prices for the things they raise and produce can never purchase the things that are produced by industry and labor. It seems to me self-evident, therefore, that if we are to have industrial recovery, we must have agricultural recovery. On the other hand, if we are to have agricultural recovery in this country we must have industrial recovery. The farmer cannot sell the things he produces and receive therefor a reasonable price unless labor is employed, unless business is receiving a fair and just income upon the amount of money honestly and prudently invested in that business.

So, Mr. Chairman, I hope no Member of any agricultural area and no Member of any industrial area will vote against this bill.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UTTERBACK. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. It is the opinion of the gentleman, I take it—and I know he has given a great deal of thought and study to this problem and to this legislation—that it will be legislation not only in the interest of the farmer but in the interest of commerce, in the interest of labor, and in the interest of the entire Nation?

Mr. UTTERBACK. That is my judgment and opinion.

Mr. SABATH. After thorough study and consideration of the subject matter?

Mr. UTTERBACK. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 230, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 168, noes 52.

So the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—H. R. 8492

Mr. EICHER. Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks let me state unequivocally that I shall vote for the pending bill. Its provisions fall short, in my judgment, of laying down a program for agriculture that is economically sound, permanently workable, and thoroughly in the national interest. Serious danger also exists that its processing tax framework may not pass the inspection of the Supreme Court when the test of Federal power under the interstate commerce clause and the taxing authority of the Constitution is applied. Because of these doubts, and also because reduced production is progressively reducing our foreign trade and making more acute our unemployment and many other national problems, I have long been urging the adoption of amendments that will substitute cost of production for parity in determining the minimum return to the agricultural producer for those products consumed at home, and such lower price for exports as will move our surplus on the world markets.

However, until these sounder provisions find a place on our statute books I shall support the processing tax because it is the farmer's tariff, hoping always that we may have the foresight to place our economic and constitutional house on a surer foundation before our Court of last resort brings it crashing about our ears.

In the confident hope that my researches will contribute something of value to congressional and public thought on this problem of all national problems, I am setting forth (1) a legal study of the processing tax versus cost of production in the light of recent Supreme Court decisions, and (2) a summarized and also a detailed explanation of the amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act that are suggested in my bill, H. R. 5580, and (3) a reprint of my bill in full, amended in several particulars to meet fully and squarely the constitutional discussion contained in the recent N. R. A. decision of the Supreme Court (the Schechter case).

I

Keeping in view the doubts that the Schechter decision has cast upon A. A. A.'s framework, it is my purpose to present herein a synopsis of the vital amendments to A. A. A. that H. R. 5580 proposes, and to demonstrate the unquestionably sound economic and constitutional foundation that, with their adoption, would then underlie the administration's entire farm program:

It will leave unrepealed all of the A. A. A. except its parity provisions and for them substitute the minimum cost of production price for the domestic consumption percentage of all farm commodities.

It will make mandatory, under penalty, the payment to producers of not less than the minimum domestic price for the domestic consumption percentage of each delivery in interstate commerce, and the issuance of receipts to producers for the export percentage of each delivery—the cashing of their receipts to await disposal of such exportable surplus on the world market by a Government export agency.

It is estimated that 90 percent of domestic consumption of staple agricultural products moves in interstate commerce between production and consumption, wherefore the small, uncontrolled intrastate market will inevitably be upheld to the preponderant federally maintained minimum. The State is to the Nation like the Nation is to the world. It is easy to keep our domestic market price up to the world market price, but not so easy to keep the world price up to our own desired level, as we have found to our sorrow.

Congressional authority to decree minimum—cost of production, fair competition—prices for agricultural products moving to their markets through interstate channels is amply sustained by the decisions hereinafter digested. The Schechter case defines the termination of interstate commerce. Also, it throws doubt on the Federal power to control production, either by compulsion or by inducement through taxation-raised benefits; this for the reason that such activities precede the beginning of interstate commerce. Under H. R. 5580 the first and only impingement of Federal power occurs when the producer starts the specific commodity into the "flow", the "current", of interstate commerce.

The Government's control over the allocation of domestic consumption percentages remains flexible, adjustable, even to the point of proclaiming production limitation of a particular crop when deemed necessary, the inducement to comply being not by benefits but by requiring the acceptance of more world-market receipts by noncomplying producers.

Manufacturing exporters, notably of textiles, can recover their lost foreign markets for finished goods by buying their raw materials from the Government export agency at a low enough price to enable them to do so, the deficit, if any, below the world price, resulting to the producers, to be made up by a processing tax on the particular commodity. This tax will be very small as compared with the present rate, and, because levied on the subject of, and for the purpose of furthering interstate and foreign commerce, will be unquestioned as to validity. There can be on it no shadow of suspicion that it is used as a mere subterfuge to make possible the exercise of an otherwise nonexistent Federal power.

It is definitely demonstrable that the A. A. A., with its existing machinery, can accurately ascertain uniformly applicable average production costs on average farms over 5-year periods that will be scientific and equitable and practically workable. For example, using the accepted practices of industry as a yardstick, it is true and can be established that over a 5-year period, reckoning the average farm as a business unit, the difference in cost of raising a bushel of corn on the average 158-acre Iowa farm and on the average 450-acre North Dakota farm will be less than 1 cent per bushel.

"Dumping" will in no sense occur; rather, through the Government surplus export agency the revival of world trade can be accelerated by processes of orderly marketing and bargaining. Price will move our agricultural products again into foreign consumption just as the Webb Act of 1918 legalized sales, below cost, of industrial goods abroad.

Fifteen years ago the net world trade of American agriculture and American industry was substantially equal. Now American agriculture has a heavily unfavorable balance of world trade, whereas American industry holds a heavily favorable balance.

In approaching the study of the decisions, let it be borne in mind that under these amendatory provisions to the A. A. A. the law first speaks when the producer seeks to market his production in the flow of interstate commerce; and then it commands the purchaser, under penalty, to pay to the producer for the domestic consumption percentage of his crop only not less than it cost the producer to raise it. That is the extent of the artificially stabilized market. With reference to the export percentages the producers are under no compulsion, except only that their interstate commerce buyer cannot legally purchase their domestic consumption percentages at the cost of production price unless they surrender to the Government at the same time the export percentages of their production and accept receipts therefor which they can later cash at the world price.

The distinguishing language between inter- and intra-state commerce, contained in the N. R. A. case of Schechter against United States, decided by the Supreme Court on Monday, May 27, 1935, is the following:

> The undisputed facts thus afford no warrant for the argument that the poultry handled by defendants at their slaughterhouse markets was in a "current" or "flow" of interstate commerce and was thus subject to congressional regulation. The mere fact that there may be a constant flow of commodities into a State does not mean that the flow continues after the property has arrived and has become commingled with the mass of property within the State and is there held solely for local disposition and use. So far as the poultry here in question is concerned, the flow in interstate commerce had ceased. The poultry had come to a permanent rest within the State. It was not held, used, or sold by defendants in relation to any further transactions in interstate commerce and was not destined for transportation to other States. Hence, decisions which deal with a stream of interstate commerce, where goods come to rest within a State temporarily and are later to go forward in interstate commerce, and with the regulation of transactions involved in that practical continuity of movement, are not applicable here. See Swift & Co. v. United States (196 U. S. 375, 387, 388); Lemke v. Farmers Grain Co. (258 U. S. 50, 55); Stafford v. Wallace (258 U. S. 495, 519); Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen (280 U. S. 420, 439); Tagg Bros. v. United States (280 U. S. 420, 439).
> 2 Did the defendants' transactions directly "affect" interstate commerce so as to be subject to Federal regulation? The power of Congress extends not only to the regulation of transactions which are part of interstate commerce but to the protection of that commerce from injury.

Following is a review of the five cases above cited:

Lemke v. Farmers Grain Co. (258 U. S., p. 50) was a suit involving the constitutionality of a statute of North Dakota regulating among other things the prices to be paid by dealers for grain purchased from producers. The majority opinion by Mr. Justice Day held that the State statute was an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce in view of the evidence that practically all the wheat purchased by the complainant in the case was for shipment to and sale in the Minneapolis market, and that this being the course of business, it fixed and determined the interstate character of the transaction. The majority opinion also distinguished the line of cases defining the beginning of interstate commerce as that time when goods begin their interstate journey by delivery to a carrier or otherwise by saying:

> None of them indicates, much less decides, that interstate commerce does not include the buying and selling of products for shipment beyond State lines.

The majority opinion contains this further language:

> It is alleged that such legislation is in the interest of the grain growers and essential to protect them from fraudulent purchases and to secure payment to them of fair prices for the grain actually sold. This may be true, but Congress is amply authorized to pass measures to protect interstate commerce if legislation of that character is needed. The supposed inconveniences and wrongs are not to be redressed by sustaining the constitutionality of laws which clearly encroach upon the field of interstate commerce placed by the Constitution under Federal control.

The minority opinion by Mr. Justice Brandeis, with whom Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice Clarke concurred, stated that the acts of the local dealers whereby the grain was bought at less than its fair value constituted frauds against which the Federal act did not purport to afford any protection, and further said:

> So far as the transactions were wholly intrastate, Congress was without power to do so. So far as the sales were part of transactions in interstate commerce, the power was ample; but Congress did not see fit to exert it. * * *

The minority opinion further stated:

> The requirement that the buyer shall take only a proper margin for graded grain is, in effect, requiring that he pay a fair price. Laws designed to prevent unfair prices are ordinarily enacted to protect consumers. But there is no constitutional objection to protecting producers against unconscionable bargains if conditions are such that it is they who require protection. Nor can there be any constitutional objection to using as a factor in determining what is fair the price prevailing in terminal markets even if they happen to be located in another State.

Stafford v. Wallace (258 U. S., p. 495) involved the right to injunctive relief against orders of the Secretary of Agriculture promulgated pursuant to the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921. The majority opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Taft held that sales of livestock in the Chicago stockyards were not merely local transactions, saying further:

> They create a local change of title, it is true, but they do not stop the flow; they merely change the private interests in the subject of the current not interfering with, but, on the contrary, being indispensable to its continuity. * * * It is manifest that Congress framed the Packers and Stockyards Act in keeping with the principles announced and applied in the opinion in the Swift case. The recital in 2, paragraph b, of title I of the act, quoted in the margin, leaves no doubt of this. The act deals with the same current of business and the same practical conception of interstate commerce.

The extract from the Packers and Stockyards Act set forth in the margin at page 520 is as follows:

> The first title, 2, paragraph b, provides that "for the purpose of this act * * * a transaction in respect to any article shall be considered to be in commerce if such article is part of that current of commerce usual in the livestock and meat-packing industries, whereby livestock (and its products) are sent from one State with the expectation that they will end their transit, after purchase, in another, including, in addition to cases within the above general description, all cases where purchase or sale is either for shipment to another State, or for slaughter of livestock within the State and shipment outside the State of the products resulting from such slaughter. Articles normally in such current of commerce shall not be considered out of such current through resort being had to any means or device intended to remove transactions in respect thereto from the provisions of this act.

Swift & Co. v. United States (196 U. S., p. 375) involved the validity of injunctive relief against violations of the Sherman Act of 1890, and it was distinctly held as follows:

> When cattle are sent for sale from a place in one State with the expectation they will end their transit after purchase in another State, and when in effect they do so with only the interruption necessary to find a purchaser at the stockyards, and when this is a constantly recurring course, it constitutes interstate commerce and purchase of the cattle is an incident of such commerce.

> It should be added that the cattle in the stockyards are not at rest even to the extent that was held sufficient to warrant taxation in American Steel & Wire Co. v. Speed (192 U. S. 500). But it may be that the question of taxation does not depend upon whether the article taxed may or may not be said to be in the course of commerce between the States, but depends upon whether the tax so far affects that commerce as to amount to a regulation of it.

Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen (262 U. S., p. 1) was a suit to enjoin enforcement of provisions of the Grain Futures Act of 1922. In the opinion of the Court by Mr. Chief Justice Taft (Justices McReynolds and Sutherland dissenting) it is said:

> In the act we are considering Congress has expressly declared that transactions and prices of grain in dealing in futures are susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control which are detrimental to the producer and consumer and persons handling grain in interstate commerce and render regulation imperative for the protection of such commerce and the national public interest therein. * * * But it is contended that it is too remote in its effect on interstate commerce, and that it is not like the direct additions to the cost of the producer of marketing cattle by exorbitant charges and discrimination of commission men and dealers, as in Stafford v. Wallace. It is said there is no relation between prices on the futures market and in cash sales. This is hardly consistent with the affidavits the plaintiffs present from the leading economists, already referred to, who say that dealing in futures stabilizes such prices. It is true that the curves of prices in the futures and in the cash sales are not parallel and that sometimes one is higher and sometimes the other. This is to be expected, because futures prices are dependent normally on judgment of the parties as to the future, and the cash prices depend on present conditions, but it is very reasonable to suppose that the one influences the other as the time of actual delivery of the futures approaches, when the prospect of heavy actual transactions at a certain fixed price must have a direct effect upon the cash prices in unfettered sales.

Tagg Bros. & Moorhead v. United States (280 U. S., p. 420) was also a suit to enjoin the enforcement of an order of the Secretary of Agriculture under the Packers and Stockyards Act prescribing a maximum tariff charge for the services at the Omaha stockyards. Appellants stressed the claim that price fixing being a direct taking of property for a supposed public benefit cannot be resorted to unless just compensation is given in return. The unanimous opinion of the Court written by Mr. Justice Brandeis contains the following language:

The argument is that in "legislative price fixing there are vital distinctions from the constitutional standpoint between property and the use of property on the one hand and personal services on the other; * * * that this rate fixing is in essence wage fixing since the stockyard services performed by the plaintiffs involved only skill and labor and that wage fixing was held to be beyond the power of Congress. * * * There is here no attempt to fix anyone's wages or to limit anyone's net income. Differences in skill, industry, and experience will continue to be factors in the earning power of the several plaintiffs. For the order fixes only the charges to be made in individual transactions."

Finally, it is to be remembered that in the New York State Milk Control case decided last year (Nebbia v. New York, 291 U. S. 502) the Supreme Court confirmed the right of a State under its police power to fix the prices of milk. In the field of interstate commerce the power of Congress is just as complete. In Brooks v. United States (267 U. S. 432) the Supreme Court upheld the right of Congress to forbid the transportation of a stolen automobile in interstate commerce on the ground that, within the field of interstate commerce, Congress enjoyed plenary police power.

II

The bill is an ambitious effort so to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act as to preserve all the gains made by the very efficient administration of its emergency provisions and to lay the foundation for a permanently workable farm policy that will be thoroughly consistent with the Democratic platform pledges of 1932.

In summary:

First. It repeals no part of the A. A. A. except the parity provisions, and substitutes therefor the cost-of-production principle as to the percentage of agricultural production that is domestically consumed.

Second. The exportable surplus—beyond the needs of an "ever normal granary"—is to be handled by a Federal agency on the world markets and net accounting made to producers—receipt holders—without subsidy or other cost to the Government.

Third. It empowers the Federal agency to supply manufacturing exporters with raw materials from the exportable surplus, under bond, at a price that will permit successful competition abroad with foreign manufacturers of similar products, the deficit, if any, from the net world price to be made up by processing taxes, which will obviously be less than one-tenth of the present schedules.

Fourth. It preserves the county and State committees, adding to their duties important advisory functions as fact-finding agencies for the Department of Agriculture in ascertaining costs of production for the various commodities and in compiling from year to year the necessary production and consumption data.

Fifth. It will induce voluntary as opposed to compulsory adjustment of acreage and production through that self-interest whereby losses suffered from the sale of excess production on world markets will impel farmers to transfer acreage to crops whose volume of production is nearer the demands of the domestic market.

Sixth. It will in no sense require "dumping", but, on the contrary, will permit controlled marketing by a Federal agency through orderly bargaining. It will contribute substantially auxiliary strength to the arms of the Department of State and the Department of Commerce in effectuating the important reciprocal trade program and in preventing the increase in subsidized competitive acreage in foreign lands.

Seventh. It empowers the Secretary of Agriculture to build up and maintain an ever normal granary out of the surplus at net world prices to the producer and to arrange for storage on farms under seal.

Eighth. It provides for loans to producers on their exportable percentages pending disposition on the world market.

Ninth. It invokes existing powers of the Government to protect domestic price levels by compensating and flexible tariffs, or by embargoes.

Tenth. It specifically reaffirms the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to limit production of any commodity, and sets up simplified alternative machinery to effectuate any desired production control program.

Eleventh. It will reduce consumer costs by promoting the stabilization which will reduce the speculative spread between prices received by producers and prices paid by consumers.

Twelfth. It will completely disarm those special interests which would destroy the A. A. A. and its tremendous accomplishments for agriculture without providing a substitute.

Thirteenth. The certain increase in agriculture's potential buying power will forthwith reopen factories, and the greater volume of commodities to be handled will substantially reduce unemployment.

Fourteenth. It is constitutional under the power to regulate interstate commerce and the power to regulate the value of money in commodities. If supplementary State legislation should prove desirable, there can be no doubt of its unanimous enactment.

DETAILED EXPLANATION OF H. R. 5580, TO AMEND A. A. A. BY SUBSTITUTING COST OF PRODUCTION FOR PARITY AND PROVIDING SURPLUS CONTROL WITH CONCESSIONS TO MANUFACTURING EXPORTERS

An appropriate text for this discussion is available in the following excerpt from the 1934 report of the Secretary of Agriculture to the President, at page 6:

Necessary as it was to meet the curtailed foreign markets and the surplus crisis of 1933, reduction in the output is only a partial and paradoxical answer in the long run to the crying need which is briefly expressed in the phrase "balanced abundance." The problem is to retain fair and reasonable profits without falling into the pit of scarcity economics.

The serious danger exists at this moment that blind opponents of "equality for agriculture with industry", willfully ignoring the truism that without it no lasting national recovery is possible, may convince our anxious country that we are in fact falling into that "pit" so graphically pictured by Secretary Wallace, and may thus accomplish the undoing of all the splendid progress that has been made toward agricultural revival under his sincere leadership since 1933. The amendments to the A. A. A. proposed in this bill, it is earnestly believed, point the only sure and safe way to the hoped for "balanced abundance", and at the same time will permit successful transition from the stop-gap devices of our emergency period to a permanently workable and economically sound farm policy that will foster the reestablishment of normal domestic and international relationships in the fields both of agriculture and of industry. Every business that endures necessarily receives cost of production. If agriculture is to remain the bulwark of our economic order and is not to sink to peasantry, it must be encouraged to operate on the basis of fair exchange both as to volume and values.

As to foodstuffs in general, it may be said that, given a cost of production return to the producer for the domestically consumed percentage, he could afford, if necessary, to give away the exportable surplus. Wheat normally averages the greatest percentage of surplus, for from 1920 to 1932, inclusive, we exported 20 percent of our wheat, including flour. In industry generally, the sales commissions and expenses run from 20 percent to perhaps 100 percent. In the great automobile industry they run as high as 35 percent. If the farmers gave the Government 20 percent of their wheat as a commission for fixing the price of the other 80 percent at a cost-of-production level, they would not be out as much as industry generally pays for selling its products. Hog production comes next, and the percentage of surplus is about half as much as the wheat percentage. The 1⅓ percent of corn and less than 1 percent of oats could be given to the Government without feeling the loss. As for beef, we have no surplus. Therefore, the farmers' problem is to get a cost-of-production price for the percentage consumed at home. Every labor organization concedes this right to farmers, and recent meetings of the textile industry have done the same. If the Government took these small surpluses, it would realize something in world markets, pay the expenses of handling them, and return something to the farmers.

Cotton presents a different problem, for the reason that over half of our cotton is exported. We also have underconsumption of cotton at the present time, just as we have of food products. Furthermore, the reduction of cotton acreage, especially in Texas, has taken away the jobs of many thousands of cotton pickers and has added to the unemployment and relief rolls. It has also reduced railroad tonnage and export business, about 90 percent of Texas cotton being exported since they have few mills for manufacturing. The A. A. A. has helped the cotton farmers by means of the 12-cent loans, and has strengthened the price of corn in the same way. Perhaps these loans have also helped the world market by holding back this cotton to some extent. If the Government could render these benefits by means of a loan, it would do much better if it had absolute control of the cotton exportable surplus. This surplus has amounted to about 65 or 70 percent of the world market for cotton, not of the world production, but of the proportion of cotton sold from one country to another. Anybody who has 65 or 70 percent of the world market requirements and has his products paid for, so that the bank cannot call his note or the sheriff sell him out, is in a position to influence and improve that world market. Also, if the Government were in control, it could use this control both ways, and perhaps check the increase of world production that is certainly encouraged by plowing up the cotton fields of the United States.

The proposed amendments provide for the protection of any foreign markets now held by American exporters, and they can buy from this exportable surplus enough raw material to meet all such demands at the world price. The bill also provides a further protection of American manufacturers by permitting the Government agency to furnish them raw materials at such prices as will enable them to compete in foreign markets with their finished product. This price may be less than the world price to be received by the farmers, which may cause a deficit, the only deficit that can occur under the provisions of this bill. In order to meet such deficit a processor's tax is provided.

Cotton is the principal product to which these provisions will apply. The amount of processor's tax to be paid on the cotton that is used for manufacture into exportable goods is not one-tenth as much as is now paid by the textile industry. If the industry itself pays this tax, there is no reason for the farmers to object, and little ground for anybody else, if it results in recovering foreign markets.

This bill seeks to combine the virtues of the A. A. A., the McNary-Haugen plan, the export-debenture plan, and the principle of cost of production for domestic consumption, plus the receipt plan of surplus control first suggested by Senator McADOO. It meets the situation first by retaining or improving the farm organizations which the Secretary of Agriculture has set up under the Adjustment Act. Section 20 gives all farm organizations an equal voice and provides a place for those not in the organization at all.

Their duties, however, will be changed. Instead of meeting to make allotments of the number of acres their neighbors will be permitted to plant, they will meet to discuss and figure out their cost of production, and this is an education needed by every farmer. Under the plan of this bill the reduction policy can perhaps be abandoned entirely upon all production except cotton, and probably even on that. The farmers are to get receipts for the percentages for exports and they get a final settlement at the world price. If they overproduce, they will get more of these receipts and a lower world price, and that is all the check deemed necessary, even on cotton.

Under this plan the Secretary of Agriculture ascertains the average cost of production to farmers of each product during the preceding 5-year period. It is thought fairest to use an average of years rather than the uncertainty of any one particular season. The individual farm is considered as a business unit and the method of computation is the same as in industry. The farmer gets the same pay for management, labor of himself, family, and hired help, as for like services in industry. He is given an adequate allowance for the depreciation of soil, improvements, equipment, stock breeding animals, work animals, buildings, and also for taxes and other overhead charges. He is allowed 4 percent upon his capital investment. Checking through the history of the country we find that 4 percent has been the average annual earnings of all capital at a normal level of values during all the history of the country, and the farmers are willing to accept the actual facts of capital earnings in our American economy. The Secretary of Agriculture estimates the total production of each farm crop as it approaches maturity. He estimates the percentage to be used in domestic consumption and to be moved in interstate commerce and he also estimates the percentage that will be for export, if any. He then makes public announcement of the cost of production price for the percentages consumed at home, and all dealers are required to pay not less than the announced prices to the farmers as they sell their crops. For the export percentages the dealer will issue a receipt countersigned by a Government agency and he will deliver that percentage to such agency with compensation for storage and handling. This Government agency can retain any portion of the exportable surplus to meet shortage in years of drought or other calamity, but it must remove it from the domestic market for all other purposes and dispose of it in world markets to the best advantage. At the end of the marketing season, as prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, these receipts will be redeemed at the post offices by this Government agency at the net price realized in the world markets, and without expense to the Treasury of the United States.

All of this can be done as a permanent remedy and solution of the farm problem. It is not an emergency matter. The parity price, as provided in the A. A. A., is repealed and the cost-of-production price substituted therefor. This is the only fundamental change in the Adjustment Act, but it is not believed that reduction of acreage will be necessary after these provisions are put in operation.

The Grain Futures Administration of the Agricultural Department has prepared a chart showing the range of the wheat market from 1897 to 1934. On this chart is a bar for each month's range of price. The amazing fact appears that during the war period the price of wheat varied from about 40 to over 100 cents during a single month. This market was usually so manipulated that wheat was bought from farmers at the low figure and sold by the speculators at the high figure. This chart shows that the farmers sold their wheat in the latter part of 1916 and the early part of 1917 at an average of $1.51 per bushel. A considerable portion of it was held over and later sold before the new crop by the speculators at a price as high as $3.45 per bushel. The price of flour to the public was fixed largely on this higher market. President Wilson was displeased with this situation and arrived at the conclusion that the $1.51 was too low for the farmers in war time, and the $3.45 was too high for the speculators. On August 10, 1917, he signed a bill authorizing the Government to fix a cost-of-production price and buy the surplus at that price. Four days later he appointed his Farm Commission. Sixteen days later this Commission completed its deliberations and on the 30th of August fixed the price of wheat at $2.20 per bushel, No. 1 Northern, Chicago. The Wheat Corporation bid that price and wheat immediately went to that level. This chart shows a straight line of wheat prices after it was thus fixed by the Government, the only straight line of prices without fluctuation or gambling in the history of wheat. Railroad rates went up 6 cents per bushel and the chart shows an equal rise of the wheat price as fixed by the Wheat Board. The Wheat Corporation bought and held $585,000,000 worth of wheat to maintain this fixed price. The shortage of world production then sent the price above the American price and the Wheat Corporation sold at a profit of $59,000,000. A few farmers were able to hold their wheat from the 1916 crop to the high speculative market in 1917. One of the great farm leaders was able to do this and he was always inclined to criticize the Wheat Corporation for pulling down the price. It did pull down the speculative price but it just as certainly raised the farmers' price.

We are now in a depression far worse than the war. Everything that was done then is more than justified now, and this bill will do the same thing for wheat and all the other products that Woodrow Wilson did in war time, and he gave the farmers the best prices and the greatest prosperity they have ever had in all their history. Their share of the national income during the war was about 20 percent, while at the present time it is only about 9 percent. More than 40 percent of our population is agricultural, and at all times it is entitled to a share of the national income at least as large as Woodrow Wilson actually gave it in war times.

This bill unites the farmers, the laboring people, and the industries. It gives the farmers the cost of production for their products, and this includes an adequate annual wage for labor, and it provides a concession to give industries a chance to make a winning fight for foreign markets.

It is said that if the price of agricultural products be increased to a cost-of-production level it will cause overproduction. Many of us who know the farmers reach an opposite conclusion. With low prices the farmer will plow up every fence corner and will try to produce enough to meet his taxes and expenses. With reasonable prices he will not make such supreme efforts. Furthermore, the analysis by the National Industrial Conference Board in its report entitled "Agricultural Problems in the United States—1926" shows that the agricultural plant has been in full operation since 1900 and that the per capita acreage and production are both constantly declining, and it concludes:

> The average farmer and his family under present conditions are working so hard, and the overhead charges for interest and taxes are so high, that stabilization or even moderate increases in prices would hardly be likely to stimulate any considerable general overexpansion of acreage or production.

This conclusion is fully sustained by the Agriculture Department's record of production and by the observations of Secretary Wallace in his book entitled "Agricultural Prices", at page 61.

What is the general economic effect of paying $500,000,000 in benefits to farmers to reduce acreage? The crops that would be produced upon this acreage at prices outlined in this bill plus the increased price on other acreage would be more than six times the value of the benefit payments, and then, too, the benefits are a taxed income and not a produced income. The conclusion follows that the general income of agriculture is lower by over $3,000,000,000 than it would be if this bill were in effect. This reduction in buying power closes factories and turns labor out of employment and deepens the industrial depression. And yet there are those who persist in maintaining the defeatist position that there can be no further improvement in agriculture except through industrial improvement. They fail to give adequate weight to the most certain factor of all, namely, that throughout our Nation's economic history agricultural production and resulting buying power was the John the Baptist of our industrial development and wealth—including factory pay rolls—and not vice versa. It is also true that much of our burdensome farm-mortgage indebtedness represents the increment prior to 1920 of agricultural capital values which was used as buying power by agriculture to build up our tremendous industrial structure.

As stated by the financial writer of the National City Bank in its bulletin for April, the Secretary deserves general support in his unremitting effort to bring the country to understand that the elementary principle of foreign trade is that exports of goods can be paid for only by imports of goods, services, or gold. But the contention that foreign lack of dollar exchange explains the 41-percent decline since last August in cotton exports is untenable, for the reason that during the period of decline foreign countries have been selling more goods to the United States and thus have had more dollar exchange. They have been buying more of other American goods, and have also bought more cotton from other countries. The writer states that during the first half of this season mills outside the United States used 1,100,000 bales less of American cotton than a year earlier, but nearly 1,000,000 bales more of other growths, their consumption of all cotton thus showing only a nominal decrease. The conclusion is obvious that our loss of cotton exports is not primarily the result of inability to buy, but of a shift in foreign demand from American to other growths, due to the more favorable prices at which the foreign growths have been selling. It appears that during the first 4 months of this season Egyptian, East Indian, and Brazilian cotton sold from half a cent to more than 2 cents a pound lower relative to American cotton than they did on the average in the three previous seasons.

Finally, it is important to note that the bill is in every respect designed to carry out the principles and demands of the Democratic platform. In formulating our permanent farm program we certainly dare do no less. The scientific studies of the Department of Agriculture itself disclose that a liberal diet for the American people would require the production from many millions more of our acres than our average cultivation of the 5 years preceding 1933. And our population increased 17,000,000 from 1920 to 1930. Those facts must be recognized in determining our long-run policy.

No; national self-containment is not the road we must choose. The American people did choose when they ratified the Democratic platform of 1932 and thus made it a binding contract. The order-taking method of salesmanship is outmoded. If we would reattract our former foreign customers we must fill our shelves, show our goods, and quote the right price. Industry sells its excess production abroad at whatever price the "traffic will bear." Revive agriculture by according it the same privilege.

[H. R. 5580, 74th Cong., 1st sess.]

A bill to amend title I of an act entitled "Agricultural Adjustment Act" (Public, No. 10, 73d Cong.), and to provide additional relief by increasing agricultural purchasing power, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That title I of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of the Seventy-third Congress be, and the same hereby is, amended by adding thereto the following sections:

"SEC. 20. For the purpose of assisting him in carrying out the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall appoint committees of farmers residing in the respective governmental subdivisions for which they are appointed and shall promulgate regulations governing appeals from their decisions. There shall be a committee for each State, and for each county or parish, and for each township, to be known as 'State, county, or parish, and township adjustment committees', respectively, and the membership of each committee shall be not less than three nor more than five. Each national and representative farm organization having a total membership of over 50,000 shall be entitled to designate one member for each of said committees, and the remaining member or members of each of said committees shall be farmers who are not and have not been members of any farm organization. The Secretary of Agriculture shall, from time to time, obtain reports from said committees on conditions in their respective jurisdictions that are pertinent to the decisions he is required to make under this act and shall arrive at such decisions after he has had the benefit of the statistical and other informative matter contained in such reports and after conference with national officers of the respective farm organizations above described.

"SEC. 21. The Secretary of Agriculture shall annually ascertain the average cost to farmers, considering average yields and production during the preceding 5-year period, of the production of each agricultural commodity produced in the United States. All items of cost shall be considered and calculated in accordance with the formula and method commonly used in the manufacturing industry. He shall consider the individual farm as a business unit and shall include compensation to farm operators for management, and for labor of themselves and their families and hired help, equal to the compensation paid for like services in industry, together with adequate allowance for depreciation of soil, improvements, equipment, stock-breeding animals, work animals, and buildings, and also for taxes and other overhead charges. He shall also determine the investment value of the property devoted to the production of such commodities, using the official census data so far as pertinent, such determination to be at the normal level of values between inflations and depressions reckoned over such period of time as will make possible the accurate ascertainment of such normal value, and upon the property investment value as so determined there shall be calculated and allowed a capital return of 4 percent. He may also ascertain and allow an equitable differential against varying transportation costs to different markets and may establish such zones or classifications as are appropriate and necessary therefor.

"SEC. 22. The Secretary of Agriculture shall annually determine and designate the beginning and ending of the appropriate marketing period for each agricultural commodity, and shall also annually estimate the volume of production for the current year of each such commodity. Prior to the marketing period for each such commodity he shall also estimate (1) the percentage thereof required for domestic consumption, and (2) the percentage thereof, if any, remaining for export.

"SEC. 23. The Secretary of Agriculture shall thereupon make public proclamation and announcement of the cost of production figures and the domestic consumption and export percentages aforesaid and of the date when and the period for which the same shall be controlling as provided herein upon the sale and purchase of each such commodity, and upon request he shall furnish detailed information to all dealers, manufacturers, millers, elevators, processors, packers, butchers, ginners, compressors, and other agencies dealing in or handling the same. After such effective date all said dealers, manufacturers, millers, elevators, processors, packers, butchers, ginners, compressors, and other agencies shall, except as modified in section 27 of this act, pay to the farmers not less than the cost of production price determined and proclaimed as aforesaid for such percentage of each delivery in interstate commerce of such commodity as is not estimated for export: Provided, That to all farmers making delivery within the first 30 days after the duly proclaimed beginning date of the marketing year applicable to the commodity so delivered the allowable minimum shall be 2 percent less than the cost of production price as aforesaid, and to all farmers making delivery during the second 30-day period after such beginning date the allowable minimum shall be 1 percent less than the cost of production price. If in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture the objectives of this act, including the furtherance of orderly marketing, require such action, the Secretary shall proclaim such further reasonable upward variations in the allowable minimum as may be necessary to attain such objectives, and also to govern such marketings by producers as may not have been completed during the designated marketing year. For the percentage, if any, of each such delivery thereof as has been estimated for export as aforesaid there shall be issued and delivered to the farmers a receipt, countersigned by such agency as the President of the United States may designate, which receipt shall show the grade of the commodity. Sales from one farmer to another for feeding, breeding, or seeding purposes shall not be subject to the provisions of this act. For the purpose of this act a transaction in respect to any commodity shall be considered to be in interstate commerce if such commodity is part of that current of commerce that is usual in the industry or industries engaged in the handling of such commodity whereby such commodity (and its products) are sent from one State with the expectation that they will end their transit, after purchase, in another, including, in addition to cases within the above general description, all cases where purchase or sale is either for shipment to another State, or for manufacturing, milling, processing, packing, slaughtering, ginning, compressing, or in any manner handling such commodity or any part thereof within the State and the shipment outside the State of the products resulting therefrom. Articles normally in such current of commerce shall not be considered out of such current through resort being had to any means or device intended to remove transactions in respect thereto from the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 24. At such reasonable time as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, the said dealers, manufacturers, millers, elevators, processors, packers, butchers, ginners, compressors, and other agencies dealing in or handling such farm products shall deliver to such agency as the President may designate all of the percentage of said commodities estimated for export in the kind and grade as receipted or in processed form as hereinafter provided. If and when authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture, bills of sale evidencing storage of such exportable percentages on farms under seal will be accepted by such agency in lieu of the physical delivery of the property. In the case of livestock and poultry, the packers and also the butchers, after processing the same subject to Government inspection, shall make delivery of the percentage estimated for export in the form of livestock and poultry products, provided that the butchers may deliver their percentages through packers, and the said agency shall pay the reasonable cost of processing; and the same provision shall apply to milk and the processors thereof. If unable to make reasonable and satisfactory arrangements for such processing, then such agency shall purchase or acquire by condemnation or construct the proper equipment and facilities. Such agency shall provide by rental, purchase, or construction, or by condemnation in State or Federal courts, the necessary storage and terminal facilities for handling the export percentages, and shall remove same entirely from the domestic market, except for emergency purposes, and shall hold and dispose of the same to the best advantage in any world market, and through the Postal Service shall redeem the receipts in the net amount realized for each product after deducting all costs and expenses of handling and disposing of the same. On the direction of the President, such agency shall hold in storage such portion of the said exportable percentages as it may deem advisable as a reserve against emergencies, droughts, and crop failures, and any portion thereof that is undisposed of on settlement date shall be held for such purpose. Settlement shall be made in full not later than the end of each designated marketing period and each farmer shall have the option to accept in full the net world price, at the time of settlement, for the percentage withheld for emergencies, or he may accept a credit of 90 percent thereof upon his receipt and await the final disposal for any balance that may be realized, or, if he has received a 90-percent loan as hereinafter authorized, he may continue the same without interest until such final disposal. The said agency is directed to estimate the cost and expense of handling each of said commodities and to estimate the probable world price and through the Postal Service to make loans to any farmers upon the security of their receipts up to 90 percent of the net value thus estimated.

"If in any locality the demand for domestic consumption is greater than the national estimated percentage, the said agency is authorized to supply the deficiency out of the exportable surplus from the same or other convenient locality at the cost of production price plus transportation, storage, and handling charges, and it shall maintain a national balance by purchasing, upon the same terms, like amounts from the percentage estimated for domestic consumption in localities where the demand for domestic consumption is less than the national estimated percentage.

"If any farmer at any time is unable to sell his products in the regular markets, the said agency is directed to accept and receipt for the exportable percentage of his production as herein provided for, and to purchase from him the percentage of his production for domestic consumption at the cost of production price and is authorized to resell such domestic consumption percentage in the domestic market at the same or higher price.

"If the percentage estimated for domestic consumption should be insufficient to supply the domestic demand, the said agency is authorized to supply such shortage out of the exportable percentage at the cost of production price, plus storage and expenses.

"SEC. 25 The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to advance, from time to time, to the Postmaster General such sums as are shown to be required for the handling and redemption of the receipts as provided herein, and for the making of loans thereon, and for the expenses of the Post Office Department in connection therewith. At the request of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Posmaster General under such regulations as he may prescribe shall require the employees of the Post Office to perform, without extra compensation, such fiscal agency services as may be desirable and practicable in connection with the handling, safe-keeping, and redemption of said receipts, and the making of loans thereon.

"SEC. 26. The said agency is authorized to use the resources and facilities of the Export-Import Bank, and upon order of the President, may use any funds collected in processors' taxes, or that are provided in section 12 (a) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act for carrying out the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 27. That part of the Agricultural Adjustment Act relating to price parity with other products is hereby repealed, and the method of determining prices as herein provided is substituted therefor: Provided, however, That, if before the beginning of any production year the factors of visible supply, prospective demand, and prospective production volume are such that in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, guided by the reports that have been submitted by the various State, county, or parish, and township committees, a limitation is necessary upon the production of any agricultural commodity or commodities during the ensuing year, he shall determine and proclaim a uniform percentage of reduction for the information of each producer of such commodity: Provided further, That the encouragement of small-unit farming as distinguished from large-scale farming is hereby declared to be desirable public policy, and the Secretary of Agriculture is, therefore, directed to determine and proclaim such reasonable differential in acreage and percentage reduction as will discourage uneconomic overproduction and will promote the social objective of more family occupied and operated farm homes. He is also directed to adopt as the production base the normal production capacity of each farm, reckoned in accordance with average farmerlike methods and practices of diversification, fertilization, and rotation, and the average annual yields and production of the same or similar farms during the preceding 5-year period. In the marketing of each such commodity produced during such year the farmer shall be paid, as herein provided, for the full domestic consumption percentage of each delivery of said commodity only in the event he presents to the purchaser at the time of sale the certificate of his county adjustment committee that he has complied with such proclamation of limitation. Any farmer delivering for sale without presentation of such certificate shall be paid not less than the proclaimed cost of production price, as provided herein, only for such portion of the domestic consumption percentage of each delivery thereof as remains after deducting from such domestic consumption percentage the percentage of proclaimed production limitation applicable thereto. For the entire remainder of each delivery each such farmer shall receive and shall accept only the receipt that is hereinbefore provided for, and said entire remainder shall be handled accordingly.

"SEC. 28. By the enactment hereof the Congress declares and invokes its constitutional power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, to promote the general welfare, and to regulate the value, in agricultural commodities, of all authorized money.

"SEC. 29. Any person, dealer, manufacturer, miller, elevator operator, processor, packer, butcher, ginner, compressor, or other agent dealing in or handling such farm products, who violates the provisions of this act by paying less than the cost-of-production prices provided for herein shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both.

"SEC. 30. The said agency is directed to protect all foreign markets for the exportable surplus of agricultural products now being held or hereafter acquired by exporters, and for that purpose is directed to furnish the necessary products, when available, at the net price to farmers as herein provided; and said agency is further directed to furnish to processors and manufacturers, under bond or other adequate guaranty of performance, from the exportable surpluses coming into its possession, any raw materials to be processed or manufactured and exported, and to do so at prices that will permit such processors and manufacturers to meet competition with their products in foreign markets upon fair and reasonable terms. Processing taxes shall be levied with respect to such commodities at such rate as may be necessary to make good any deficit in the net prices payable to farmers for the exportable surpluses thereof.

"SEC. 31. The President of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of Commerce are directed to cooperate in exercising their lawful powers, through the medium of foreign trade agreements, and through other appropriate measures for restriction or expansion of imports of competing agricultural commodities, their byproducts, and/or competing substitutes, to maintain the prices to farmers for the domestically consumed percentages of all agricultural commodities as nearly as may be within a range not exceeding 10 percent above the proclaimed cost-of-production price level."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, the Agricultural Committee, of which I have long been a member, has devoted many weeks to careful consideration of this bill to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act. As a result, we now have a measure reported from the committee without a dissenting vote and which I am glad to support.

This bill differs greatly from the original draft. Some controversial features, including the issuing of so-called "imposed licenses" were taken out, while desirable additions, such as the export bounty plan, were put in. If the bill contained nothing more than the latter provision designed to help in marketing abroad more of our surplus farm crops it would be entitled to support.

In fact, as a permanent farm help I regard this as perhaps the most valuable feature of the bill. Back in 1929, when the Hoover farm marketing measure, against which I was one of 35 House Members to vote, was before our committee, I offered an amendment to put this provision in the bill, but without success. So it is with some satisfaction that I now see, in substance at least, the same provision approved, not only by the House, but, if I read the papers correctly, by the Republican "grass roots" meeting recently held in Illinois.

But before discussing further the proposed amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act I wish to speak of the original act itself. This measure, while not perfect, is remarkable in at least one respect. For the first time, the farmers of the United States were allowed to have their own plan tried out. Until this bill was approved by Franklin D. Roosevelt no other President had been willing to let producers have what they wanted in the way of farm relief legislation and which the Congress, notably by the passage of the McNary-Haugen bill, had done the utmost to grant. There was no veto of farm legislation by President Roosevelt as there had been by President Coolidge and President Hoover.

As to how long it may be advisable to continue the main provisions of the A. A. A. it is now too early to say. It is certain, though, that up to now, due in part to the terrible drought of 1934 in the Corn Belt, the wheat and corn-and-hog checks, have saved many farmers from complete failure. Right now, when excessive rains and consequent floods are delaying corn planting and holding up other farm work in last year's drought region, the outlook would be darker still but for the Roosevelt farm program, for which all farmers may be truly thankful.

Personally, I have not thought of the present farm program as permanent in the sense of affording a full and satisfactory solution of the agricultural program, a program of as vital interest to the cities as to the country, for until the purchasing power of the farmer has been restored the big, once self-satisfied cities cannot prosper as in the past. Incidentally, we have heard in the discussion on the bill now under consideration complaints to the effect that to provide crop payments to farmers is unfair to city consumers. My answer is that whenever he has money to spend the farmer buys goods and so helps the merchant, manufacturer, and others in the cities. The man who is broke is a poor customer. To help the farmer is to help all.

Getting back to what I was about to say, what I should like would be to see us get rid, within reason, of all subsidies, but so long as there is continued a high protective tariff, greatest of all subsidies, it is advisable to do what we can do, directly or indirectly, to relieve agriculture of the heavy burdens imposed. In other words, as it sometimes is necessary to fight fire with fire, so it may be necessary to fight subsidy with subsidy. This is what some of the A. A. A. provisions mean—mean the tariff in reverse, mean benefits to the farmer.

We cannot afford to be content with present conditions, but must look to getting back our foreign markets. Well can we afford to spend as much money for market expansion as for crop curtailment. Prosperity through plenty, rather than security through scarcity, should represent our ultimate aim. I have no great fear, in the future years, of an overproduction of food in America, taking 1 year with another, provided there is proper distribution. I say this because population is increasing, while acre yield, due to loss of soil fertility, is decreasing.

If at any time there is overproduction of staple crops two avenues are open. Either a proper part of the surplus may be stored—and this "ever normal" granary plan as now advocated by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace and as referred to in the story of Joseph's interpretation of Pharaoh's dream as told in the forty-first chapter of Genesis, holds good—or plans may be perfected to market more of the farm surplus abroad. As to the latter, the present high protective tariff stands most in the way.

Speaking of the tariff, I quote briefly from a great keynote speech, a real agricultural program, as made by Franklin D. Roosevelt at Topeka, Kans., on September 14, 1932:

> The present administration, and the two previous administrations, in all of which the President was an important member, failed utterly to understand the farm problem as a national whole, or to plan for its relief; and second, they destroyed the foreign markets for our exportable farm surplus beginning with the Fordney-McCumber tariff and ending with the Grundy tariff, thus violating the simplest principle of international trade, and forcing the inevitable retaliation of foreign countries.
> "One way of attacking this disparity is by restoring international trade through tariff readjustments. You farmers put this well in a single phrase, 'we must make the tariff effective.'"
> "When the depression in agriculture began in 1921, Republican leaders first sought to belittle the plight of agriculture. They claimed that the old familiar tariff remedy would suffice, and they offered the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act, passed (God save the mark) under the ironic label of farm relief. The Republican leaders in positions of national responsibility at that time—and this, of course, includes the then Secretary of Commerce—either did not or would not realize the change in international conditions due to international debts. They closed their eyes to the outstanding economic fact. Prior to the war we had paid our interest on our debts to Europe by means of agricultural exports. After the war, because we had changed to a creditor, and Europe was in debt to us, it was necessary that we demand either goods or gold in return. The Fordney-McCumber tariff barrier shut off the normal trend of trade. Europe could not pay, so she could not buy. Specifically, she began to stop buying our surplus farm products."

So, Mr. Chairman, in supporting the bill now being considered—a bill containing many good features, some temporary yet necessary to help get agriculture out of the hole where it was at the beginning of the Roosevelt administration, and others more permanent in character—I feel, as Mr.

Roosevelt expressed in his address from which I have just quoted, that as a long-time proposition the assistance promised in getting back foreign markets is best of all.

Truly, to again quote from the Roosevelt speech at Topeka:

> Industry can never prosper unless the agricultural market is restored and farm buying power returns.

Happily, as shown by present prices for livestock and grain and practically everything else the farmer has to sell, as compared with "before Roosevelt" prices, farm buying power has even now advanced far on the return road.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the people of my State know that I do not approve of the governmental theories or the principles incident to and involved in the original so-called "triple A" legislation. I cannot yet believe that these theories or principles are right or that they will be upheld, either by the people themselves or eventually by the Supreme Court, insofar as the delegation of power to regulate and to regiment and to impose taxes among other matters and things to which I object are found in the act.

Moreover, I am fearful that the power which is granted may be used equally as well to the disadvantage as to the advantage of those who favor the act as originally drawn and now sought to be amended. I just cannot bring myself to favor the theories which underlie the original legislation, and I question very seriously that any ultimate benefit to agriculture is effected by these amendments.

I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but one is not required so to be in order to venture the opinion that the A. A. A. will eventually go the way of the N. R. A. And this I know is the opinion of many of its most interested advocates. It is a situation that confronts us, however, and not a theory, for the dairy farmers and others whose interests are tied up with and in them in my State have been aided and assisted by the original A. A. A. Act, insofar as its provisions applied to the milk licenses, and there is no denying the fact. Their very livelihood was at stake; and under the act, whether it be constitutional or not, their interests were or have been protected, their dairies were saved, and they received more for their milk at their door as producers than they otherwise would have received in the present chaotic condition. In the proposed amendments they see their hope of continued existence, if not prosperity, and there is considerable force in their contention. What helps them helps indirectly and directly all the people of my State. One cannot conscientiously oppose, on grounds real or imaginary, legislation that really benefits the farmer.

As some of you know, I could not bring myself to support some of the other bills which were presented to the Committee on Agriculture for its consideration, my principal objection being against the delegation of authority to the Secretary of Agriculture. But this bill which we are today considering materially changes the former bills and definitely limits and circumscribes the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture. Even this bill does not go as far as I would like to have it, but some of the objections which I have had to the former legislation have been removed. I do not like the provisions of the bill which prepare the way for the maintenance of artificial prices, the restriction of imports, and the dumping of exports abroad. I do not like the confused scramble for temporary gains regardless of the principles which are involved and with little thought for the ultimate welfare of the farmer. Nevertheless, it cannot be overlooked there are temporary gains, and that the dairy farmers in my State are in a desperate situation.

This bill affords temporary relief which he must have if he is to survive the present chaotic condition, so I am constrained to vote for the bill; to be an opportunist if you like, and for once to follow Thomas Jefferson, of whom it was said:

> He was an opportunist to be sure. He never refused the half loaf he could get because of the whole loaf he could not have. He trimmed his sails at times to save his craft, and this was wisdom. He compromised at the call of necessity.

I am going to vote for these amendments, hoping, but very much in doubt as to whether or not I am voting for the best ultimate interests of the farmer.

It is the milk situation in Vermont which is the compelling and determining motivating force which impels me to vote as I do. I am advised, and with reservations I admit that as a temporary measure the provisions in the act involving assistance to the dairy farmers are justified by their interests and exigencies. They themselves admit they are not favorable to the use of compulsion on the part of the Federal Government as a general rule, but they contend that so long as certain handlers of milk and other dairy products refuse to cooperate with the dairy farmers so that the farmers may receive a reasonable return for their toil, just so long do they feel that it is entirely right and proper for the Federal Government to exercise its powers to the end that the farmer will receive his fair share of the consumer's dollar. It may not be right and proper, but I see no other way out in the existing situation.

I am also advised the marketing agreement provision of the A. A. A. is amended by this bill in an effort to define the limits of interstate commerce in a manner which will comply with the rules laid down by the Supreme Court in the N. R. A. case.

They aver that the old license section of the A. A. A. has been entirely rewritten and that the changes insofar as they affect dairy farmers are as follows:

First. The term "license" is abandoned and the word "order" is used in its place. This change is made because of the fact that the penalties for violation have been changed from a revocation of the violators right to do business to a schedule of fines. This change made the use of the word "license" meaningless. The word "order", on the other hand, is used in connection with the Packers and Stockyards Act, the Interstate Commerce Commission Act, the Federal Trade Commission Act, and similar Federal legislation.

Second. The definition of "interstate commerce" in the order section is amended to meet the requirements of the Supreme Court in the N. R. A. case.

Third. To meet the requirement of the Supreme Court that definite limitations must be placed on delegation of authority, to the executive or administrative branches of the Government, the provisions which may be placed in an order are definitely set out. These provisions in the case of milk and its products are:

(a) Provisions for fixing the minimum prices to be paid producers or associations of producers by distributors or processors.

(b) Provisions for the fixing of prices on a use classification basis.

(c) Provisions for differentials to cover grade, quality, location, production, volume, and market.

(d) Provisions for the use of the individual dealer-pool plan, the market-pool plan, and the base-surplus plan. In connection with the individual dealer-pool plan the act requires that such a plan must be approved by three-fourths.

The plans for selling milk above discussed are the ones used in practically every milk market in the United States. They have been developed over a period of the last 20 years by the cooperative associations who, during this period, have been selling milk in the various markets of this country.

(e) Provisions for the operation of an equalization fund in the market so that all dealers will pay the same price for milk in each use classification.

(f) Provisions requiring that new producers receive the manufacturing price for a period of 90 days after they come into the market.

(g) Provisions providing for a check-off from producers for the purpose of verifying weights, sampling and testing, and for the guaranty of dealer payments.

(h) A provision guaranteeing the right of a cooperative association operating in more than one market to blend its sales and pay its producers in accordance with the contract between the cooperative and its producers. This does not, however, permit any cooperative to sell milk at prices less than those fixed by the Secretary's order.

(i) Provisions prohibiting unfair methods of competition and unfair trade practices.

(j) Provisions for the appointment of market administrators or industry boards to administer the orders.

The provisions above discussed are the only ones which may be included in orders covering milk and its products. It is not necessary, however, that each order contain all of these provisions. Only those provisions which are necessary in the particular market or in connection with the individual product will be used. Certain of the provisions will naturally be used only in orders affecting fluid milk and cream, while others will be used only in connection with manufactured milk products in the event that the producers of manufactured dairy products desire to utilize the marketing agreement and order sections of the bill.

Fourth. Every order issued by the Secretary must be based on a marketing agreement. Orders may be issued by the Secretary—

(a) To make effective a marketing agreement signed by the processors, distributors, or other handlers of at least 50 percent of the volume of the commodity or product covered by the order; or

(b) Where the processors, distributors, or other handlers refuse to sign a marketing agreement the Secretary with the approval of the President may issue an order making such marketing agreement effective if two-thirds of the producers by number or volume of the commodity or product covered by the proposed marketing agreement approve the issuance of such order.

Fifth. The Secretary is required to terminate any order issued by him when such termination is requested by a majority of the producers in number and volume of the commodity or product covered by the order.

Sixth. The Secretary is required to give due consideration to the different conditions existing in the production and marketing of commodities in various parts of the country.

Seventh. Retailers of milk and producer-distributors are required to comply with the provisions of any order affecting them.

Eighth. In determining whether producers approve or disapprove a proposed marketing agreement or in determining whether they desire to terminate any order, the Secretary is given permission to allow bona fide cooperatives to voice the sentiments of their producers. We feel that Congress should make it mandatory on the Secretary to accept the expression of the bona fide cooperative association as evidence of the sentiment of its membership.

Ninth. The act provides for the filing of reports by parties to marketing agreements or persons subject to orders and the examination of their books and records relative to operations affecting the marketing agreement or order. This information must be kept confidential by the Secretary except in cases of hearings or law suits on violations of any agreement or order. The Secretary is, however, permitted to publish the names of violators and to issue composite reports in connection with the operation of marketing agreements or orders which shall not identify information obtained from any particular person.

Tenth. A provision is contained authorizing the Secretary to cooperate with State agencies in connection with programs under the A. A. A. This provision also requires that before any confidential information is furnished to such agencies that they shall agree to keep such information confidential in the same manner as is required of Federal employees under the act.

Eleventh. The bill provides for the collection from all handlers of their pro rata share of the expense of administering a marketing agreement or order. The share of any cooperative under this section is to be measured by the quantity of the commodity distributed, processed, or shipped by such cooperative.

There are those who contend that the decision in the Schechter case spells the eventual finding by the Supreme Court that the A. A. A. and these amendments are unconstitutional, and very able lawyers are convinced there can be no question that this will be the case. On the other hand, there are equally as able lawyers who hold to the contrary.

I was interested in what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY] had to say in respect to the legal construction which would be given the act, especially with reference to milk-marketing orders or licenses. He said:

In metropolitan milk markets, such as Boston, there is, of course a relatively small volume of milk which is produced in the same State in which it is distributed, and hence does not move in interstate commerce. The application of milk orders to this relatively small amount of milk is amply justified under the doctrine that Congress has the power to regulate interstate commerce when intrastate commerce is so intermingled with the interstate commerce regulated that effective regulation of the latter requires regulation of the former, or when the regulation of interstate commerce alone would give an unfair competitive advantage to intrastate commerce of the same character, or when intrastate commerce directly affects or burdens interstate commerce. Thus, the Interstate Commerce Commission may regulate intrastate railroad rates when such intrastate rates, if unregulated, would hinder effective regulation of interstate railroad rates, or would discriminate against those who ship goods in interstate commerce (the Shreveport case, 234 U. S. 342; United States v. Louisiana, 290 U. S. 70; New York v. United States, 257 U. S. 591).

It seems obvious that in these interstate milk markets the fixing of minimum producer prices for interstate milk could not be effective without fixing equivalent prices for intrastate milk which is in direct competition with interstate milk, and the fixing of minimum producer prices for interstate milk alone would clearly discriminate against such milk.

Therefore it would appear that there can be no very serious question that the fixing of minimum producer prices for milk is permissible under the due-process clause of the fifth amendment. Nebbia v. New York (291 U. S. 502) and Hegeman Farms Corporation v. Baldwin (293 U. S. 163) established that fixing such minimum producer prices for milk does not contravene the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment, and it is well settled that the restraints of the fifth amendment upon congressional legislation are no greater than those of the fourteenth amendment upon State legislation (Heiner v. Donnan, 285 U. S. 312, 316).

Some time ago Governor Smith, of Vermont, appointed a special commission composed of E. B. Cornwall, of Middlebury, Vt., chairman; John P. Candon, of Pittsford, and Wallace H. Gilpin, of Barton, to investigate the Boston milk-market situation, which commission made the following report:

In the light of Judge Brewster's decision against the Boston milk license, and in favor of the Seven Oaks and Westwood Farms organization, whose producers are in Vermont, every milk producer in Vermont must realize that the market is in the most precarious situation in several years, and that now is the time for every producer to give his utmost to cooperate with his purchasing unit, and that such unit if need be, must temporarily give and take with other units to preserve the advantage now offered the producer by the A. A. A. Boston milk license. It is more important just now that there be complete cooperation between organizations than at any time in years, to prevent an absolutely ruinous situation in the Boston market.

The Seven Oaks decision is a most unfortunate one from the Vermont producers' standpoint. Producer groups have been altogether too ignorant of the effect they may be having upon the entire market, by what seems at the moment a personal gain in market or in price. Unfortunately, too, we find there is a fostering of sentiment among individual producers against other groups. This is probably unintentional in some cases. In others it appears intentional.

There is still a lack of friendliness between producer groups which tends to unstabilize the market. This is unfortunate and is causing a most unhappy sentiment against Vermont and Vermont milk producers as a whole in Massachusetts. Legislation is threatened in that State, which would harm all Vermont producers, because of the growing feeling in Boston and in Massachusetts that Vermont producers are quarreling among themselves. This is one of the most serious points in the entire situation. Let every individual producer and producer group remember this: If Massachusetts passes laws against Vermont, it will be probably largely the result of Vermonters' actions.

If the different marketing units continue to jockey for position in case of a smash-up, the smash-up is inevitable. It will mean a milk war, the cost to be borne by all the farmers of New England. It will be useless to try to allocate the blame, probably no unit will be blameless. The fact is that the farmer who is now beginning to pay his bills and meet his interest payments at the bank will again be "broke."

If the units will cooperate to a reasonable extent, the present license system can be saved and improved, regardless of lawyers and court decisions. This result will be made easier of attainment if Vermont's congressional delegation and those of other States realize the importance of the passage of the A. A. A. amendments.

Commenting with respect to this report the Hon. Wallace H. Gilpin, a member of the Commission, has this to say:

Problems surrounding milk production, milk prices, and milk marketing are among the most argued questions in New England. This has been true since the New England dairyman became essentially a milk producer instead of a butter and cream manufacturer, and there is no reason to believe the problems can be permanently settled to the satisfaction of all factions.

A few fundamental features of the problems might well be considered and if once established in the minds of those who would discuss milk problems, will assist in making certain phases of the situation clear. One of the first is to realize that the price paid the producer for class 1 milk is an artificial price forced to a higher level than the natural price milk will bring manufactured into any of many dairy products, such as butter, cheese, casein, etc. Such artificial price invites trouble. Witness farmers in one area attempting to get two ratings for a single farm in order to get more milk into the class 1 level; and in the market consider the temptation to sell class 2 milk at the class 1 price.

In order to give every milk producer an equal chance at the artificial class 1 price the Federal Government, through the A. A. A. and a Boston area license plan, has figured carefully from records of production in the past a base rating for each farmer. This rating is founded on the total sales of class 1 milk in the Boston market. Every pound of milk the producer makes above his base rating, he must realize from the start, is being produced in direct competition with the western dairyman, who can produce milk cheaper than here, because that surplus milk must go into products which the western dairyman makes, and all such products can be stored and shipped anywhere.

The producer sometime feels that he is cheated by the Boston distributor who double-crosses him on the surplus or class 2 milk, but every investigation carried on by farmer representatives indicates that this is not true to any great extent. The large dealers are kept well under control by Federal and State boards with expert audits which begin at the country milk station and are carried to the very consumer. In fact, there appears to be no attempt on the part of any of the larger dealers to do this thing and what the small dealer may get away with is negligible. In fact, the Federal Government, in the Boston market, is employing numerous expert accountants from entirely outside concerns to do this type of work, and their figures are hardly open to doubt.

The greatest trouble appears to be cutthroat competition among Boston distributors for the Boston business, and lack of farmer cooperation in the country. Repeatedly those who have studied the problem state that if the milk producers of Vermont could and would get together solidly, there would be no milk problem left except that problem to which every business is open, viz, general conditions in the market. But so long as the producers themselves are split into factions so long will the Boston market have opportunity to play with them.

The A. A. A. Boston license has undoubtedly given the New England milk producer a much better milk check than he would have otherwise had, better than the New York producer gets; and the Massachusetts milk control board is making an honest, if weak, attempt to aid the producer who will not be aided except in sections and by factions. This reflects upon the whole of Vermont and is undoubtedly responsible for the growing dissatisfaction among Massachusetts dairymen and other Massachusetts interests with Vermont's milk position and attempted legislation there which would materially damage the entire milk-production business in Vermont. Temporary patching of trouble may avail for a time in the Boston milk market, but sooner or later the producers of Vermont must all get solidly together or the class 1 milk price will be wiped out by unnecessary and damaging Boston competition which warring and dissenting factions here encourage and unconsciously abet.

As Milo C. Reynolds, commenting editorially on Judge Brewster's decision holding the Boston milk-marketing agreement illegal, void, and unenforceable, pertinently pointed out in the Burlington Clipper of May 23:

There are principles in this decision which, if sustained by a higher court, would completely wipe out of existence all regimentation of production and enforced regulation of business and industry. In the face of this decision, which will seriously affect the Vermont farmer unless some other plan is evolved to take its place, there is more reason than ever for the Vermont dairymen to get together in a solidified organization. If it is illegal for the Federal Government to put in a regulation which fixes the price that the farmer shall be paid for his milk, then the farmer has got to take the situation in his own hands. This can only be done by organization and such organization has got to be thorough and complete.

To cry over this decison is not going to help matters. The producers' interest is in the future and not the past. The thing to determine now is the best procedure to protect the milk price in that Boston market. A good deal has been gained during the past year. There must be some way that measures can be adopted to hold that gain. It may be such a result can be brought about through a complete organization of the producers of Vermont. If that is the best method, then no time should be lost in bringing about such an organization. If milk leaders by any tactics attempt to discourage such an organization, they should be swept aside. The interest of the Vermont producer is paramount in this State to that of any dealer or any distributor. And the interest of these producers is so far-reaching that it affects all the people of the State.

This legislation we are considering is admittedly to be enacted in the alleged interest of the farmer. There can be no question, as was said at Springfield, Ill., recently that—

The farmer of right is entitled to a fair proportionate part of the national income and to receive a parity price for the products of his farm in domestic markets.

It may be that the original act and these last amendments, insofar as they seek to control and regulate production and processing, are unconstitutional; that the price-fixing provisions and those imposing agreements upon minorities and upon majorities are a deprivation of property of private citizens without their consent and without compensation, and are therefore unconstitutional. And the original bill and these amendments may in other respects be held unconstitutional. To be perfectly frank with you, I do not see how it can be otherwise; nevertheless, as a temporary expedient, because of the exigency of the situation which confronts the farmers of my State, and since under the circumstances, political and otherwise, I see no other way, so long as the provisions of the original act are in force and operative, to obtain the desired temporary relief for them, I am forced to take whatever of temporary benefit and relief I can get in the manner and form prescribed by the terms of this act, as amended, whether I like it or not.

Mr. UTTERBACK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss the bill now pending before the House, H. R. 8492, a bill to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which has been recommended for our approval by the Committee on Agriculture after a long and exhaustive study.

It is appropriate that a Democratic administration should lay before this Congress a bill that is the most comprehensive and far-reaching piece of legislation for the benefit of farmers ever enacted in the history of this or any other country.

Twenty-three years ago this month, in June 1912, the Democratic Party in convention at Baltimore, Md., wrote in its platform a plank proposing a study of agricultural credits and endorsing legislation permitting national banks to loan a reasonable proportion of their funds on real-estate security. Woodrow Wilson was the nominee of that convention. His election to the Presidency in November 1912 was the birth of legislation for the real financial benefit of American farmers. Under the direction of President Wilson the first step was taken to set up a system of Federal farm credits to relieve American farmers of high interest rates and overhead charges in connection with farm loans.

PRESIDENT WILSON VETOES FORDNEY TARIFF

The World War interrupted President Wilson's agricultural program. In the last 2 years of his administration a Republican Congress dominated by high-tariff industrialists refused to follow the leadership of President Wilson and passed the Fordney Tariff Act of 1920. One of President Wilson's last official acts was to veto that bill. If his three Republican successors to the White House had followed his example, they would have done much to have prevented the decline of American agriculture in the 12 years that followed March 4, 1921, and that reached a climax in the economic collapse during the Hoover administration.

President Wilson was not deceived about the effect of tariffs on agriculture. His keen mind and his discerning eye surveyed the situation and read the answer clearly and accurately. He vetoed legislation to revive the War Finance Corporation to loan money to European countries. It was clear to him that buyers could not always be buyers or borrowers. He knew that borrowed money must be repaid or the lender must stop lending sooner or later. The war changed us from a debtor to a creditor nation, and every loan we made abroad increased the debt burden upon our former creditors who are now our debtors.

President Wilson realized that these debtors had no money. He knew that they could repay our loans in only one way; that was by selling us enough of our products to pay the interest on their debts and something on the principal.

The foreign market for the products of 40,000,000 acres of American farm land that were brought into production during the World War ceased to exist after the war ended and the soldiers of Europe returned to their farms. The foreign market for the products of American factories theoretically ceased to exist at the same moment, but American manufacturers in cooperation with American international bankers supported the foreign market for the products of American factories upon a false and unsound foundation for 10 years by loaning $15,000,000,000 of American money abroad.

The Republican Congress in the last 2 years of President Wilson's administration and three successive Republican administrations thereafter either could not or would not see and admit that self-evident fundamental common-sense business situation. More foreign loans and higher tariffs were the only answers they had to the problem. It was like building a 100-story building on sand. Sooner or later a building so constructed is certain to collapse.

MONEY DRAINED FROM FARM BANKS

New York bankers who made most of the foreign loans made them to support the sales of products of factories which they owned. However, it was not their money that they loaned. That money was drained from the banks in the agricultural areas of the country. At the same time, prices of agricultural products were declining almost steadily and as a result of this unsound post-war industrial boom, the disparity between the prices of agricultural products and industrial products increased year after year.

There were no foreign loans to support exports of agricultural products. New York bankers and Republican administrations left the American farmers to shift for themselves. During practically the entire period from 1921 to 1929 farm prices were below the cost of production and farmers were being crushed financially between the millstones of debt and insufficient incomes. Three successive Republican administrations did nothing to help them. At the same time the cash reserves of farmers and Midwest business men in banks of the agricultural area were being siphoned off to New York and thence to Europe.

Twice in this period Democrats in Congress joined Progressive Republicans and gathered sufficient votes to force a bill through Republican Congresses designed to enable the farmer to help himself. That bill was the McNary-Haugen bill. It proposed to finance the export of agricultural surpluses by the export debenture plan. The farmers of the United States asked for that plan. They were able to muster sufficient strength among Democrats and Progressive Republicans to push it through Congress twice, but each time it was vetoed by a Republican President and could not be passed over the vetoes.

A well that is pumped hard enough and long enough finally runs dry if the water supply is not replenished. Financial reserves that are siphoned away finally disappear if incomes do not equal the outgo. That is what happened to the United States during the period from 1921 to 1933. The well ran dry. Financial reserves disappeared.

The American farmer produces the new wealth upon which most of the Nation does business. For many years he supplied the money to support billions of dollars of foreign loans, so that our international bankers and their industrial plants might continue to fatten on rich foreign business. The farmer did not realize what was going on. He knew that the prices of his products were going down and that the prices of the things he bought were going up, but he did not understand the cause. Few persons outside of a select circle did. American agriculture was being strangled gradually. It was being strangled ruthlessly and heartlessly—and those who were doing it were gradually cutting away the principal support of American industry. They were destroying the jobs of millions of American workingmen.

Ultimate collapse was as certain as night follows day. American agriculture finally reached the exhaustion point. Hundreds of banks in the agricultural areas closed under the strain of those trying years 1921 to 1929. Thousands of farm mortgages were foreclosed.

The agricultural depression began in 1921. The industrial depression began in 1929 when a weakened and exhausted agriculture could not carry the load any longer. Then industrial unemployment swept over the land. Then the American farmer and the American laboring man stumbled on hand in hand to the brink of economic chaos and social revolution as the whole house of cards built on the unsound economic practices of three Republican administrations crumbled in the greatest economic collapse in history, the panic of 1932–33.

I would like to review briefly the legislative record on the tariff and farm relief of the three Republican administrations from 1921 to 1933.

REPUBLICAN TARIFF LAWS MAKE FARM SITUATION WORSE

The Fordney Tariff Act of 1921 became a law when President Harding signed it on June 27, 1921. According to our Republican friends, this act was to have solved the agricultural problem. Speeches made in Congress in support of the bill indicated the Republican administration believed it would. A higher tariff was the Harding administration's proposed solution of the farm problem, but the entire country knows now that the Fordney tariff did not solve the problem. It made the condition of agriculture worse.

It was clearly apparent several months later that the farm problem remained unsolved. Then Secretary of Agriculture Henry C. Wallace, father of our distinguished Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace, insisted that President Harding call a national agricultural conference to discuss the situation. With farm mortgage foreclosures increasing, as a wave of bank failures swept over the agricultural areas of the country and with land values and farm prices registering further declines, the conference met during the winter of 1922. For the first time in the history of our country, farmers were asked to assist in planning for agriculture. More than 300 farmers and 90 other persons representing various agricultural interests attended the conference. A total of 39 legislative recommendations were made to Congress and the President.

Among other things, the farmers asked Congress and the President to take steps immediately to reestablish a fair exchange value for all farm products. The Republican administration answered that request by enacting another tariff bill raising the rates established in 1921. The Tariff Act of 1923 merely increased the farmer's distress by increasing the prices of the things he bought on the protected and controlled industrial market while the prices of his products, sold at the world price because of uncontrolled surpluses, continued to decline.

The doctrine of the McNary-Haugen bill was in the air in 1923. In 1924 the first McNary-Haugen bill was introduced in Congress. It failed to pass by 40 votes and as if to halt the rising tide of agricultural strength, our rugged Republican individualists handed the farmer another meaningless sop in the shape of a 12-cent increase in the tariff on wheat. But although the tariff on wheat was fixed at 42 cents a bushel, and on corn at 25 cents a bushel, farm prices continued to decline, farm mortgage foreclosures continued to increase and the wave of bank failures continued unabated in the agricultural areas.

Again in 1925 the McNary-Haugen bill was before Congress but friends of the farmers were unable to gather sufficient strength to force a vote. In March 1925, President Coolidge addressed the annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation. He condemned the McNary-Haugen plan as price fixing, defended the tariff system as a boon to agriculture and asserted that agriculture was nearly back to normal. However, it took more than words of a Republican President to stop farm foreclosures and farm-bank failures. More than 5,000 small banks closed in this country between 1921 and 1929.

A new McNary-Haugen bill reappeared in 1926, but it was defeated in the Republican Congress. Finally, in that year, business men of the country began to show some interest in the farmer's plight. The National Industrial Conference Board, representing business interests, took note of the agricultural situation and urged strongly the need for agricultural relief legislation. Farm groups became more insistent but the Republican administration did nothing.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE VETOES M'NARY-HAUGEN BILL

In 1927 the McNary-Haugen bill was ushered in again. This time, the bipartisan agricultural strength of Democrats and Progressive Republicans was sufficient to push it through Congress, but the bill encountered a veto at the hands of a Republican President, Calvin Coolidge.

The McNary-Haugen bill was passed again in 1928. Again it was vetoed by President Coolidge and from 1928 to 1932 the farmers of America sank deeper and deeper into the mire of depression. In 1930 after the collapse of industry and with unemployment spreading over the land, the Republicans raised the tariff again. Under the leadership of President Hoover, a Republican Congress passed the infamous Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. In the next 12 months the annual gross income of the American farmer declined from $9,414,000,000 to $6,911,000,000, or more than 25 percent.

In an attempt to save themselves, the farmers raised every possible bushel of grain and pound of fiber and produced every possible pound of meat and animal products. Their efforts to meet fixed charges of taxes, interests, and living costs in this way, were defeated by still further decline of prices and still lower gross income. In 1920 the gross farm income of the American farmer was $13,566,000,000. In 1932, after 12 years of uninterrupted Republican administration, the gross income of the American farmer was $4,328,000,000, a decline of $9,238,000,000, or approximately 70 percent in 12 years.

That was the answer of Republican administrations to American agriculture, which was pleading for assistance. That was the way three successive Republican Presidents solved the farm problem. They were starving the farmer out.

During the period of 1916 to 1920, when food prices were high, the farmer gained and held a slight economic advantage over industry. Farm prices advanced faster than the prices of the things the farmer buys. The farmer lost this advantage in 1921 and his disadvantage increased steadily from then until March 4, 1933, when Franklin D. Roosevelt became President of the United States.

During three successive Republican administrations, the American farmer engaged in a losing fight against the effects and results of a high protective tariff policy that finally caused over 50 foreign nations, not only in Europe but including Canada and the South American republics as well, to pass retaliatory tariff laws, fix import quotas, and establish embargoes which destroyed almost the last bit of foreign market for our agricultural and industrial products.

Canada raised a high tariff wall against all American products, both manufactured and agricultural. It put a tariff of 25 cents per bushel on corn and similar tariffs on other agricultural products, yet they cannot raise corn profitably in Canada for the reason that the season is too short. In the fall of 1932, when Iowa corn was selling for 7 cents to 12 cents a bushel, when it was being used as fuel to heat Iowa farm homes, Canada was paying 35 cents a bushel for inferior corn imported from South Africa and South America. Iowa corn should and would have been purchased for Canada's needs except for the retaliatory tariffs raised by Canada against the excessive and greedy tariff rates fixed in the Smoot-Hawley Act.

MANUFACTURERS OPEN PLANTS ABROAD

The big manufacturers had a way to meet the situation. They simply took some of the millions of dollars they had accumulated under the special privilege high tariff trust policy of Republican administrations, went to Canada and other foreign countries, built branch factories, installed new machinery, used foreign raw materials, employed foreign labor, and manufactured the identical products they had formerly manufactured in the United States, where they had used American raw materials and American labor. In that way they were able to avoid the payments of tariff and to escape the limitations imposed by quotas and embargoes. The result of such an industrial policy was the discharge of thousands of American workers from factories and mines. This condition made it impossible for those formerly employed in industry to purchase the products of the farms and pay a fair price for them. As a result, the farmer lost a large part of his former domestic market in addition to losing all of his foreign market. In addition to all this, the farmer struggled against high transportation costs, high interest rates, and finally against insect pests and drought.

The agricultural record of the Republican Party has been written. It was written during the years 1921 to 1933 in indelible facts that the people of this country, particularly the American farmers, will not forget soon. It is a record of neglect and failure, deceit and double dealing. The harvest of that record was hundreds of thousands of farm foreclosures, collapse of farm values, thousands of bank failures, incalculable financial distress and suffering among millions of farm people, utter discouragement and despair in the agricultural areas of the country, and, in a large measure, the industrial and financial collapse of the country in 1929–32.

Yet in the face of all that, the Republican Party wrote in its platform in 1932 the following statement:

> Under Republican administration the position of agriculture was gradually improved.

In accepting the nomination for a second term, President Hoover said:

> The farmer was never so dependent upon his tariff protection for recovery as he is at the present time. We shall hold to that.

Franklin D. Roosevelt was inaugurated President of the United States on March 4, 1933. At that time farm products were selling at the lowest prices in 60 years. Many Iowa farmers were burning corn in their stoves. Some public buildings in Iowa were being heated with corn that officials had purchased at 10 cents or less a bushel.

For more than 6 months before President Roosevelt took office farmers of the United States were on the verge of open revolt against economic conditions that had been imposed upon them by Republican administrations. Farm strikes, farm holiday movements, and open resistance to foreclosure sales occurred throughout the country. These were not sporadic oubursts, they were common occurrences. These were organized efforts of farmers to keep their homes in the face of steadily increasing distress and hardship. The belief that President Roosevelt and the Democratic Congress, in cooperation with newly elected Democratic Governors and Democratic State legislatures, would do something to help them was the only hope of millions of farm people in those dark days when the powerful forces of depression were tightening around them.

DEMOCRATS DID NOT FAIL

President Roosevelt and his fellow Democrats did not fail the farmers. The President promised action and he kept his promise. He summoned farm leaders of the country to Washington for conferences with him and Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace. Three Republican Presidents from 1921 to 1933 denied the farmers what they asked. President Roosevelt said to the farmers: "Tell us what you want done and we will do it." The Agricultural Adjustment Act was written to conform with the ideas of farm leaders.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act became a law on May 12, 1933. In that act Congress declared that an economic emergency existed in part because of the breaking down of farm prices and resultant disparity between the prices of agricultural and other commodities. Congress declared its policy to reestablish prices to farmers at a level that would give agricultural commodities a purchasing power, with respect to articles that farmers buy, equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the pre-war period of 1909–14.

This readjustment is not complete, but a comparison of prices in the winter of 1932 to 1933 and the present time shows how well the program has succeeded.

In December 1932 the farm price of wheat was 32 cents a bushel. Today it is 90 cents a bushel.

In December 1932 the farm price of corn was 19 cents a bushel. Corn actually sold as low as 12, 10, and even 7 cents a bushel. Today it is selling for 85 cents a bushel.

In December 1932 the farm price of cotton was 5 cents a pound. Today it is 12 cents a pound and prosperity is returning to the Southern cotton districts.

At the close of 1932 the farmer was receiving the lowest price in 54 years for his hogs. The Chicago hog market was $2.73 per hundred pounds. Many farmers in Iowa, where more hogs are raised than in any other State, sold hogs for less than 2 cents a pound. Today the Iowa farmer is getting $9 a hundred pounds for his hogs.

Prices of other farm products have advanced in comparison. In addition to all this, under the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act hundreds of millions of dollars have been paid in benefits to agricultural adjustment contract signers. On March 31, 1935, collections of processing taxes and related funds totaled $777,770,476.76. Payments to contract signers, administration costs, and refunds up to the same time totaled $797,013,505.13.

Processing taxes are an integral and essential part of the agricultural adjustment program.

The theory of this tax as defined in the Agricultural Adjustment Act is based on the belief that farmers should receive parity prices for their products. The rate of processing tax is the difference between the current farm price and parity. Thus in the case of cotton parity was determined at approximately 16 cents a pound. The present farm price is slightly under 12 cents a pound. The processing tax of 4.2 cents a pound makes up the difference. The processing tax on wheat is 30 cents a bushel, and on hogs is $2.25 per hundred pounds.

In their effort to feed the world during the war the farmers of America brought 40,000,000 acres of new land into production, and built up an agricultural industry that could not be effectively reduced by individual action. The processing tax is the means with which the farmers can unite cooperatively in more than 5,000 production-control associations in the country to control production effectively to the end that they may receive parity prices for their products.

It will be seen from the above table that agricultural adjustment contract signers in Iowa were paid $70,376,519.14 in processing-tax land rental and crop adjustment benefits up to April 30, 1935. In Iowa and throughout the country every farmer has received two more dollars in price increases for every dollar that has been paid in processing-tax benefits. In other words, the processing tax has been multiplied by three in actual benefits to agriculture. All farmers, whether they have signed crop-adjustment contracts or not, have shared in the price increases that have been brought about by the agricultural adjustment program.

In 1932 the gross farm income of the United States was $4,328,000,000.

In 1933, the first year of the agricultural adjustment program, the gross income of American farmers was $5,051,000,000, an increase of 17 percent over 1932.

In 1934, the second year of the agricultural-adjustment program, the gross income of American farmers was $6,100,000,000, an increase of 41 percent over 1932.

In 1935 the gross income of American farmers will be still higher. It is still below what it should be, but it is increasing and will continue to increase until the parity price is reached if the agricultural adjustment program of President Roosevelt's administration is continued.

FARM AND LABOR INCOME EQUAL

Only those who are unsympathetic to the welfare of the farmer and the country as a whole can logically oppose this program. It has brought order out of chaos. It has enabled millions of farmers to retain their homes and to gradually regain financial independence. The increased buying power of agriculture is already reflected in higher factory pay rolls, increased industrial production, larger sales, and an improvement in general business conditions. Over a long period of years, from 1920 to 1935, farm income and labor income have been practically equal in this country. They rise and fall together. When farm income is high, labor income is high. When farm income is low, labor income is low. It is to the interest of workers in the cities that farm incomes increase because their income will increase also.

Action to increase the income of farmers was quick and effective, once the Agricultural Adjustment Act was enacted. Under authority granted in the act, the Secretary of Agriculture approved an emergency hog-marketing program and a corn loan program. Under the hog-marketing program the Government purchased 7,000,000 pigs that would have flooded the market later as mature fat hogs. Edible meat that could be salvaged was used for unemployment relief. Farmers benefited by an increase in the price of marketable hogs. Corn that would have been fed at a loss to growing pigs was saved on the farms.

The corn loan program made it unnecessary for farmers to sell their corn in order to get money. There was an abundant supply of corn in most of the Corn Belt during the winter of 1933–34. In connection with the effort the Agricultural Adjustment Administration was making to advance the price of corn it was desirable to keep surplus corn off the market not only to prevent the market price from being depressed but also to keep the grain out of the hands of speculators and on the farms so that farmers might ultimately receive the full increase in price that was to result from the Agricultural Adjustment program.

With corn selling at approximately 35 cents a bushel in November 1933, the Secretary of Agriculture announced a corn loan plan. Corn was sealed on farms and 45 cents a bushel was loaned to the owners.

The amount of corn loans by States was as follows:

Colorado	$70,000
Illinois	31,100,000
Indiana	1,200,000
Iowa	57,150,000
Kansas	1,000,000
Minnesota	5,500,000
Missouri	1,000,000
Nebraska	22,000,000
Ohio	280,000
South Dakota	1,700,000
Total	121,000,000

The corn loan program kept millions of bushels of corn off a depressed market. Farmers who needed money to pay their taxes, interest, and living expenses were loaned 10 cents more a bushel than the market price. Today all those loans have been paid. Not a dime has been lost by the Government. This is in sharp contrast to loans that have been made by the Government for some other purposes since 1929, notably to certain banks and railroad companies. Millions of bushels of corn that were sealed on farms has been sold by farmers at more than 75 cents a bushel. The farmers have paid their loans and have had 30 cents a bushel in addition.

Approximately $121,000,000 was loaned by the Government on 267,000,000 bushels of corn during the winter of 1933–34. A large percent of these loans were made to Iowa farmers. At the time the loan was announced the farm price of corn in Iowa was 35 cents a bushel. At the announced expiration of the loan—July 15, 1934—the price of corn had reached 51 cents a bushel. Millions of bushels were released upon payment of the loans. Millions of bushels were resealed for new loans. The corn loan program for 1934–35 authorized loans of 55 cents a bushel. Corn thus sealed was in the hands of thousands of farmers in the drought area last summer and winter. Their crops burned in the fields, but in many cases they had corn on which the Government had loaned them 45 or 55 cents a bushel. Thus they had feed for their livestock at a reasonable cost, when otherwise they would have had to pay grain speculators upward of $1 a bushel. If the corn was not used for feed, farmers had the opportunity to sell their corn for 70 cents or more a bushel. The profit on sealed corn above the amount the Government loaned to Iowa farmers was actually more than the farmers received for their full crop in 1932.

The following table shows the gain realized by farmers of the various States on sealed corn as a result of the increase in price between December 15, 1933, and July 15, 1934:

State	Farm price Dec. 15, 1933 (per bushel)	Farm price July 15, 1934 (per bushel)	Difference between Dec. 15, 1933, and July 15, 1934	Approximate bushels sealed	Difference in value, Dec. 15, 1933 to July 15, 1934

Total					42,790,882.23

Those figures do not show the total gain to farmers from the corn-sealing program. Many farmers did not seal all their corn. Some farmers sealed none; but all farmers benefited by the price increase that followed, not only in the price of corn but of livestock and other farm products. The corn-loan program has been justly acclaimed a great success. It never could have been or would have been adopted except for the agricultural adjustment program. Crop loans of such magnitude are only possible in connection with an effective program of crop control.

Briefly that is the record of the agricultural program of the Roosevelt administration from March 4, 1933, to now, with particular reference to benefits that have accrued to corn-hog farmers of the Central West. My colleagues from the cotton, wheat, and tobacco districts have detailed more completely the benefits that have accrued to the farmers of their districts.

A. A. A. IS POPULAR WITH FARMERS

The agricultural-adjustment program has been popular with the farmers. It has been a democratic program from the start. The farmers told President Roosevelt and Congress what they wanted. It was given to them. Then farmers elected their own representatives in 5,000 crop-control associations in the country to direct the program. During the last 8 months almost 3,000,000 farmers have voted in four referendums to continue the adjustment program. More than 86 percent of the votes were in favor of the program.

In administering any great comprehensive and far-reaching piece of legislation experience frequently proves that certain changes would be beneficial. Administration and enforcement of legislation disclose imperfections. This is perfectly natural.

It was not to be expected that the Agricultural Adjustment Act would work out perfectly as first enacted. In the 2 years since May 12, 1933, some imperfections have been discovered. It has been determined that some changes and some additions are desirable. These will make the act more effective and more beneficial for the farmers of the United States. At the same time they will not affect unjustly any person or group of persons in the country.

The amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act that are proposed in the bill now before the House of Representatives will make the act more flexible. They will permit the use of different plans for different commodities, thus enabling the plan to be fitted to a particular commodity.

The amendments have two principal purposes. The first is to continue and make the agricultural adjustment program more effective. The second is to make certain that the program of agricultural adjustment will be carried on within the powers given Congress under the Constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court in the Schechter case.

The bill provides for "the ever normal granary plan." The Government is authorized to purchase agricultural commodities which have been pledged as security for Government loans and to use these commodities as payments in kind to producers who cooperate in the crop adjustment program. Adequate reserves of food and other agricultural products can be maintained in this manner. These reserves will be effective insurance against unfavorable crop conditions and will tend to prevent such great fluctuations in prices as have occurred in the past.

The bill sets up a plan for effective marketing agreements and Executive orders to accomplish the object of the parity price for certain nonbasic agricultural commodities. It continues the production-adjustment program for basic agricultural commodities.

The parity price is redefined in the bill, so as to include current interest payments per acre on farm indebtedness secured by real estate and tax payments per acre on farm real estate. At the present time, taxes per acre and mortgage interest per acre are probably about 160 to 170 percent of the pre-war level. This method of figuring the parity price may be expected to give parity standards approximately 5 percent higher than under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933.

TARIFF RECEIPTS TO AID FARMERS

The bill authorizes restrictions on imports from abroad which might threaten the success of the agricultural-adjustment program. An important addition to the present Agricultural Adjustment Act authorizes an annual appropriation of 30 percent of the gross customs or import duty receipts of the Government for the use of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. Since the farm population of the United States is roughly 30 percent of the total population, this provision will make available for the benefit of the farmer a sum equivalent to his fair share of tariff receipts. On the basis of tariff receipts during the last 3 years, it is expected that approximately $100,000,000 annually will be available for the benefit of farmers.

This fund can be used to encourage the exportation of major agricultural commodities and products, to remove agricultural commodities and products from the normal channels of trade, to acquire submarginal farming and grazing lands and retire them from agricultural production, and to finance acreage and production adjustment benefit payments of agricultural commodities. The bill is comprehensive and far-reaching. It will provide funds for expanding the domestic markets for the fullest utilization of our agricultural resources and for recapturing foreign markets wherever possible.

These Agricultural Adjustment Act amendments carry the new deal's farm-crop controls much farther than did the emergency act of 1933. They are necessary if we propose to deal with the great basic industry of agriculture with a long-range view and embrace all of our six and a half million farmers.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act has served as a brake on agricultural overproduction. Last year it retired 36,000,000 acres from production of crops, of which large surpluses had been accumulated. Farm income has increased $1,772,000,000. A permanent policy must be able to cope with all possible crop conditions—normal, bumper, and unfavorable. These amendments will forestall danger of crop shortages by permitting the Secretary of Agriculture to use rental and benefit payments to increase as well as to reduce crops. The ever normal granary plan will permit the Government to acquire nonperishable grains and fibers, such as corn and cotton, and seal them in granaries on farms or in warehouses as protection against drought or other crop disasters. Under this plan the Government can maintain reserves without being forced to dump them as it did wheat under the old Farm Board scheme.

These amendments will safeguard the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933. They will extend its usefulness and provide programs flexible enough to continue and maintain the rehabilitation of American agriculture. The bill was ready for action by the House of Representatives 2 weeks ago, but was sent back to the Agricultural Committee for further study after the Supreme Court handed down its decision on N. R. A. codes. It is the opinion of attorneys for the Government that the provisions of the bill now conform to requirements laid down by the Supreme Court in the Schechter poultry case.

ADMINISTERED BY TWO IOWANS

The Agricultural Adjustment Act has been administered, and these amendments proposed in this bill will be administered, by two Iowa men of great ability, the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace, and the Administrator of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, Chester C. Davis. Secretary Wallace and Mr. Davis are native Iowans. The distinguished Secretary is a graduate of Iowa State College, which is located in my congressional district. It is one of the great if not the greatest agricultural college in the world. Mr. Davis is a graduate of Grinnell College, a great institution located only a few miles from my congressional district. Both of these men knew farming and farm problems as young boys. They have given their lives to the service of agriculture.

Before coming to Washington, Secretary Wallace was editor of a great farm journal that has been published by three generations of the Wallace family. For many years he has been known as a scholarly student of agriculture, economics, and other scientific problems. He owns and operates a grain and dairy farm, located near Des Moines. He knows the farm problem from personal contact with farmers and from personal experience. The interest of the common man is close to his heart, because he is a common man himself.

Many of the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act were written as the fruit of ideas that were born in the brain of Henry A. Wallace and that he had given publicity to in the editorial columns of his farm journal. Henry A. Wallace conferred with Franklin D. Roosevelt on agricultural matters during the campaign of 1932. Henry A. Wallace was summoned to Warm Springs, Ga., after the election, to discuss proposed agricultural legislation with the President-elect. Henry A. Wallace has the confidence of farm people. When he was named Secretary of Agriculture, the farmers of America knew that their hopes were to be realized if within the possibility of human endeavor. If there is one man more than any other who should be given the credit for the inception, the development, the administration, and the success of the agricultural adjustment program, it is the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace.

Chester C. Davis has toiled at the Secretary's side. While the Secretary has been busy with the multitude of official duties of his office, Chester C. Davis has given undivided attention to the agricultural adjustment program. His sympathetic understanding of the farm problems and his great administrative ability have made the Agricultural Adjustment Act a virile, living thing, that has meant financial salvation for millions of American farmers and given them new hope for the future.

Mr. Speaker, this session of Congress has had before it many bills of importance to the people of the entire Nation, but no bill that has been before this Congress up to the present hour is of greater importance, not only to the people of the agricultural districts of this country but to the people of the entire Nation, than the pending bill amending the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

This bill is important because our agricultural interests want and need the extension of the benefits of the Agricultural Adjustment program. This bill is important to those representing industrial districts for the simple reason that industry in this Nation cannot recover, cannot prosper unless the agricultural interests of this country likewise recover and prosper.

Two years and a half ago, I saw corn shoveled into the furnaces and stoves of homes and public buildings in the State of Iowa—corn that had been offered for sale or had been sold at 10 cents or less a bushel. Farmers who received such prices for the things they raise and produce cannot purchase the things that are produced by industry and labor. It seems to me self-evident, therefore, that if we are to have industrial recovery we must have agricultural recovery. On the other hand, if we are to have agricultural recovery in this country, we must have industrial recovery. The farmer cannot sell the things he produces for a fair and reasonable price unless labor is employed at reasonable wages and unless business is receiving a fair and just income upon the amount of money honestly and prudently invested in that business.

So, Mr. Speaker, I hope no Member from any agricultural district and no Member from any industrial district will vote against this bill. It is my opinion that this legislation is not only in the interest of the farmer but in the interest of commerce, in the interest of labor, and in the interest of the entire Nation.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, that this is legislation in the immediate interest and for the benefit of the farmers of the country in general nobody can deny.

None the less, I am further convinced that the legislation is designed to favorably affect our entire population.

The repeated assertion that the enactment of this proposed legislation would increase the cost of living may be justified to a small extent; but I have always believed, as now, that if we increase the purchasing power of the farmers it will help all, and this has been proved by the increased demand of farmers for manufactured articles, which in turn benefits the workers.

Agriculture is the oldest occupation of man. Agriculture is the pillar of our permanent prosperity. Unless the farmer receives a fair return for his products, our whole social structure is irremediably out of joint. Give agriculture a fair return for its products, and its increased purchasing power will cause the wheels of industry to hum like music to the ears of workers in industry and industrialists, and no complaint will be heard from any constructive source about a small increase in the cost of living.

We must use in some quantity all the products of agriculture, while agriculturists without money can fairly well, though not comfortably, exist without many products of industry; therefore, it plainly follows that our first desideratum should be, in evolving a scheme to benefit all, to help the farmer. The pending legislation will undoubtedly help agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the pending bill contains provisions that I wish could be avoided; but, after all, we must face the iron fact that all legislation is to a degree a compromise between clashing aspirations and conflicting attitudes. We cannot please all who would like to go further than this bill goes or who would eliminate some of its provisions.

Naturally, there are some Republicans and even some Democrats who are opposed to this proposed measure, but, everything considered, I am confident that most Members of broad and penetrating experience and enlightened vision will ultimately conclude that the pending bill is fair and deserves the support and active encouragement of all well-meaning Members.

When some of our Republican friends who are obstructively opposing this legislation reach home and feel the throbbing pulse of their constituencies they will want to claim credit for aiding in the adoption of this wholesome legislation.

Of those who for partisan advantage criticize almost every effort of the present Democratic majority, I need say little. They identify themselves readily. Their carpings will not avail, regardless of the number of "grass roots" conferences they may hold and the amount of misinformation they may try to feed their constituencies. The enlightened, the thinking people of this Nation will remember the years 1930, 1931, and 1932, and with gratitude the improvement in our national life effected since the election of President Roosevelt and the Democratic Congress.

Mr. Speaker, as a Member from the great State of Illinois, in whose capital the so-called "grass roots" parley was held, I have taken careful notice of the 18 points or grievances that parley set forth. This is a forerunner of what they feel will aid them in their campaign, from now up to the date of election in 1936 in their attempt to regain control that was, happily for our common country, wrested from unfaithful, incompetent, short-sighted hands.

I believe it would have been of real interest to the American people if the leaders of the "grass roots" parley should have familiarized the Nation with their real motive, whom they actually represented, and where the money to defray the expenses of that conference came from.

That gathering must at once appear as a most ridiculous attempt by "has-beens" and repudiated leaders to regain the saddle. It is interesting, yes, amusing, and farcical. We all recognize that the leaders of the Republican Party will shortly be charged with having pulled a great boner. It will open the eyes of the American people to the desperate chance the "grass rooters" are taking in an effort to block, in the first place, the pending wholesome legislation, and, next, to effect their desire to continue to serve the special interests, as in the past.

Unfortunately for them, when they selected Springfield, the capital of our State, the home of Abraham Lincoln, they committed the most colossal blunder in the selection of a vantage ground from which to assail President Roosevelt in connection with his interview in regard to the decision of the Supreme Court in the National Industrial Recovery Act case. Had they possessed a modicum of intelligence, or recalled simple history, Springfield, the home of Lincoln, would have been the last place for them to meet, because this great man in no uncertain terms in the Dred Scott case made clear that the American people had rights of which even the Supreme Court could not deprive them. I remember that a majority of these gentlemen are the same men who assailed all of those advocating the repeal of the eighteenth amendment as nullifiers, but notwithstanding these ridiculous charges the country by an overwhelming majority did vote to repeal the Prohibition Act. And notwithstanding it had been held constitutional by the Supreme Court and notwithstanding it took away police powers from the respective States. The founding fathers, who gave Congress the legislative power, the President the executive power, and the Supreme Court the judicial power, never intended to vest all of these powers in one arm of government—the judiciary. True, today we have many so-called "judge-made" laws forced upon us by legal technicians and the beneficiaries of special interests never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

In view of the contemptible manner in which the "grass rooters" have assailed President Roosevelt and his worthy and successful efforts for the Nation, I feel that the Congress should know the leaders of the "grass roots" movement, especially some of those who are responsible for the ridiculous, unfair, and unwarranted charges against President Roosevelt and the Democratic Congress, and who would admit, if they were honest, that only the strenuous and courageous efforts of the Congress and legislation of his initiation saved us, as many believe, from revolutionary troubles.

I have many times portrayed conditions that existed in 1930, 1931, and 1932, when 80 percent of our plants, factories, banks, and other businesses closed and 16,000,000 willing workers were unemployed; when it became necessary for the Federal Government to advance money to municipalities and States to feed the hungry—yes, starving—unemployed, as contrasted with conditions of today. Therefore I need not restate those unhappy conditions. All those conditions were known to these leaders of the "grass roots" conference, and especially to the keynoter, that feeble old man, ex-Governor Lowden, who permitted himself to be used by such other ex-Republican officeholders as ex-Senator Deneen; ex-Senator Glenn; ex-chairman of the Illinois Commerce Commission, Frank L. Smith; Mr. Doyle; Mr. Brooks; and many others who are today drawing—thanks to Republican Federal judges—large, unwarranted salaries as useless receivers and attorneys for receivers that they themselves helped to create.

In a futile effort to cause thinking and injured persons to forget that misrule, inefficiency, unconscionably sharp business practices, and machinations that effected the greatest catastrophe in the history of this or any other country, they hide behind the Constitution and the doctrine of State rights. Unfortunately they have the same regard for the Constitution and State rights as they have had for the general welfare of our citizenry, which regard is nil. They fatuously hope that they may by this hue and cry "stand by the Constitution" and "respect State rights", again deceive the voters. I am convinced, though, that the vast majority of the American people will not be misled by them.

The "grass rooters" have in stentorian tones quoted the Founding Fathers and that great Southerner, Calhoun, in connection with the Constitution and State rights.

Let me for a moment, please, hark back to the pronouncements of some of the Founding Fathers. And I shall rely chiefly upon Washington, the founder of the Republic, Jefferson, the fountain of its idealism, and Lincoln, the exemplar of its magnanimity and the preserver of its internal unity.

Both Washington and Jefferson anticipated "periodic repairs." It was the wise and immortal Washington, standing, as always, foursquare to all the winds that blow, who said that—

> The warmest friends and the best supporters the Constitution has do not contend that it is free from imperfections; but they found them unavoidable and are sensible; if evil is likely to arise therefrom, the remedy must come hereafter.

Again, it was Jefferson, that stalwart opponent of a centralized government, who said, in a letter dated July 12, 1816, to Samuel Kercheval, on the Constitution:

> Some men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence, and deem them like the Ark of the Covenant, too sacred to be touched. They ascribe to the men of the preceding age a wisdom more than human, and suppose what they did to be beyond amendment. I knew that age well; I belonged to it, and labored with it. It deserved well of its country. It was very like the present, but without the experience of the present; and 40 years of experience in government is worth a century of book-reading and this they would say themselves, were they to rise from the dead. I am certainly not an advocate for frequent and untried changes in laws and constitutions. I think moderate imperfections had better be borne with; because, when once known, we accommodate ourselves to them, and find practical means of correcting their ill effects. But I know also, that laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. As that becomes more developed, more enlightened, as new discoveries are made, new truths disclosed, and manners and opinions change with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also, and keep pace with the times. We might as well require a man to wear still the coat which fitted him when a boy as civilized society to remain ever under the regimen of their * * * ancestors. * * * Each generation is as independent as the one preceding, as that was of all which had gone before. It has then, like them, a right to choose for itself the form of government it believes most promotive of its own happiness; consequently, to accommodate to the circumstances in which it finds itself, that received from its predecessors; and it is for the peace and good of mankind that a solemn opportunity of doing this * * * should be provided by the Constitution; so that it may be handed on, with periodical repairs, from generation to generation, to the end of time, if anything human can so long endure. * * * This corporeal globe, and everything upon it, belong to its present corporeal inhabitants, during their generation. They alone have a right to direct what is the concern of themselves alone, and to declare the law of that direction. * * * If this avenue be shut to the call of sufferance, it will make itself heard through that of force, and we shall go on, as other nations are going, in the endless circle of oppression, rebellion, reformation; and oppression, rebellion, reformation, again; and so on forever.

In conclusion let me briefly quote an extract from the immortal President and founder of the Republican Party, Lincoln, in his debate with Douglas concerning the Dred Scott decision. He said:

> We believe as much as Judge Douglas (perhaps more) in obedience to and respect for the judicial department of Government. We think its decision on constitutional questions, when fully settled, should control not only the particular cases decided but the general policy of the country, subject to be disturbed only by amendments of the Constitution as provided in that instrument itself. More than this would be revolution. But we think the Dred Scott decision is erroneous. We know the Court that made it has often overruled its own decisions, and we shall do what we can to have it overrule this.

To strengthen his position Lincoln quoted President Jackson in connection with Jackson's veto of an act of Congress, as follows:

> If the opinion of the Supreme Court covered the whole ground of this act it ought not to control the coordinate authorities of this Government. The Congress, the Executive, and the Court must, each for itself, be guided by its own opinion of the Constitution. Each public officer who takes an oath to support the Constitution swears that he will support it as he understands it and not as it is understood by others.

I am sure that if Lincoln were alive he would resent and condemn the action of the "grass roots" leaders and wholeheartedly approve the humane policies and practices of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. Against the words of the four great and good Americans, Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln, I have quoted, we have the ex-Republican officeholders trying to create damaging prejudice against President Roosevelt. Whom shall we believe, the "grass rooters" and has-beens, who desire at any cost to regain with all fours the trough of Hoover, or the words of men who will stand for countless centuries as exponents of real and constructive wisdom?

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 263

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 1958, a bill to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Labor, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. SNELL. Is it the intention to bring up that bill tomorrow?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand it is the plan to bring up the Wagner-Connery labor-disputes bill tomorrow.

PARTICIPATION OF THE UNITED STATES IN TEXAS CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 264

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution No. 131, a joint resolution providing for the participation of the United States in the Texas Centennial Exposition and Celebrations to be held in the State of Texas during the years 1935 and 1936, etc. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the joint resolution for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the rule just presented is in place of a rule presented the other day in which there were some errors. I ask unanimous consent that a similar resolution, House Resolution 257, may be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL MEMORIAL MILITARY PARK IN VICINITY OF KENNESAW MOUNTAIN

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill (H. R. 59) to create a national memorial military park at and in the vicinity of Kennesaw Mountain, in the State of Georgia, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the conference report.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 59) to create a national memorial military park at and in the vicinity of Kenesaw Mountain in the State of Georgia, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

JOHN J. MCSWAIN,
LISTER HILL,
HARRY C. RANSLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

MORRIS SHEPPARD,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
ROBERT D. CAREY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House, having met in full and free conference with like managers on the part of the Senate constituting the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to H. R. 59, beg leave to submit the following statement:

The Senate amendment consisted of striking out certain language authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to purchase additional lands in order to round out and complete the area of the Kennesaw Mountain Battlefield Park, if said lands could be purchased at reasonable prices, and if the prices demanded be unreasonable in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, then that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to exercise the right of eminent domain and to condemn such parcel or parcels of land as he deem necessary in order to complete and round out the area of said battlefield park. As a result of the conference, the Senate agreed to recede from its said amendment, and the language of the bill will remain as it was when the bill passed the House.

JOHN J. MCSWAIN,
LISTER HILL,
HARRY C. RANSLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COLUMBIA INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1180) to amend section 4865 of the Revised Statutes, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the number of beneficiaries from the several States and Territories authorized by section 4865 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, for admission to the collegiate department of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf, be, and it hereby is, increased from 125 to 145.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DURHAM COUNTY, N. C.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 7374) to amend section 98 of the Judicial Code to provide for the inclusion of Durham County, N. C., in the middle district of North Carolina, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand from the gentleman from North Carolina, this is a matter of local convenience and is entirely satisfactory to the people in that part of the State?

Mr. UMSTEAD. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MOTT. May I ask the gentleman on what subject this bill bears?

Mr. UMSTEAD. It is for the purpose of transferring a county from one judicial district to the other. There are three Federal judicial districts in the State of North Carolina. This bill transfers the county of Durham, which is my home country, from the eastern district to the middle district and is by the unanimous consent of the bar of that county.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 98 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 28, sec. 179), is amended (1) by striking out "Durham", in the second paragraph thereof, and (2) by inserting "Durham", immediately after the comma following the word "Davie" in the fourth paragraph of such section.

SEC. 2. The act entitled "An act to provide for the times and places for holding court for the eastern district of North Carolina", approved May 10, 1928, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 28, sec. 179a), is amended (1) by striking out "at Durham on the first Mondays in March and September;", and (2) by amending the second proviso to read as follows: "And provided further, That at Wilson it shall be made incumbent upon that place to provide suitable facilities for holding the court."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A SHAMELESS DESECRATION

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to something that concerns every American, especially in these days of stress and difficulty. I refer to the causes that are contributing to the break-down of the morale of the American people.

One of them is the shameless abuse of the radio broadcasting. When the eighteenth amendment was repealed we were assured that the bar was gone and that the liquor interests had learned their lesson. Despite these promises the bar is back and thousands of people are being killed on the highways through the operation of cars by drunken drivers. In addition to that there comes over the radio nightly a glorification of booze. This goes into the homes of our people, where children and youths are indoctrinated with the fictitious merits of "John Barleycorn." I have introduced a bill today which will prohibit the sending of this destructive antisocial advertising into the homes of America. I invite the sympathetic support of the Members of the House.

At this time I particularly wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this group of advertisers, who are trying to make the youth of America "alcohol conscious", have no respect for American tradition, however sacred. A national broadcast on last Tuesday night used Lincoln's Gettysburg Address as a medium for this nefarious practice.

I have filed a protest with our former colleague the Chairman of the Communications Commission, Hon. Anning S. Prall, and am appending it and his answer hereto.

JUNE 6, 1935.

Hon. ANNING S. PRALL,
Chairman Federal Communications Commission,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COMMISSIONER: On Tuesday night of this week I had the misfortune to be listening in on a Nation-wide broadcast which came from Hollywood and was made by one Ben Bernie.

He was indoctrinating the youth of the country on the fictitious merits of alcohol and used as his vehicle a paraphrase of Lincoln's Gettysburg Address. There is no spoken word in the English tongue more beautiful in thought and expression than this same brief but matchless oration. I have seen it stated that it is the first classic of the English tongue. This musical mountebank paraphrased the Gettysburg Address into an appeal to the country to drink a certain brand of beer. He mutilated the address to this end and subjected it to his misplaced and vulgar comedy.

I realize that you have no power of censorship over these stations, but you do have the right to refuse to issue a license. Cannot this power be exercised in some way so that this shameless performance will not be repeated?

With regards, I am very sincerely yours,

FRANCIS D. CULKIN,
Member Congress, Thirty-second District, New York.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
June 12, 1935.

Hon. FRANCIS D. CULKIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN CULKIN: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of June 6, 1935, making reference to a broadcast over a Hollywood station by Ben Bernie.

With regard thereto, you are advised that although the Commission may not take any action directly or indirectly to censor programs broadcast by radio stations, the Commission has the power to take into consideration the past activities of stations when acting upon their applications for renewal of license.

This matter is being given appropriate attention by the law department of the Commission. In order to aid it in this work, the Commission will appreciate your advice as to the station or stations which, to your knowledge, have carried the program in question.

Sincerely yours,

ANNING S. PRALL, Chairman.

I am confident that under the administration of Chairman Prall every effort will be made to make the radio a constructive, educational force which will preserve and protect our best traditions. A continuation of the present type of advertising will lead the Nation into economic and moral confusion.

THE PRICE WE PAY

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a very short editorial by a young man whom I have known since early childhood. This editorial was printed in a Texas paper, and the editor's name is Dale Miller.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following short editorial by Dale Miller in the Texas Weekly:

THE PRICE WE PAY

By Dale Miller in Texas Weekly

The elaborate bureau set up in Washington to undertake the expenditure of the work-relief fund recently made available by Congress is all set now to "divy up" the $4,800,000,000 among the States. Each State receives an allotment determined by its proportionate number on relief. The total number on relief in the United States is 4,584,657 families, which means that, in the sixth year of the depression, about 1 out of every 6 persons in the United States is dependent on his Government for subsistence.

Big figures such as these are probably so familiar to everybody these days that they evoke only yawns whenever they are phalanxed together to describe another adventure in Government, and perhaps one should not have the temerity at this late hour to view them with alarm. The idea is, of course, that the expenditure of this huge sum will prime the pump, and the wheels of prosperity will begin to turn. So the prevailing mood is one of complacency.

But somehow we cannot forget that this same complacency awaited the 15-cent cotton that the passage of the Bankhead Law was to have made possible before August of last year, nor can we forget that this same complacency awaited the employment of 6,000,000 persons which was to have been made possible by Labor Day through the enactment of the N. R. A. 2 years ago. One after another the bubbles burst, and one after another we blow them brighter still.

This is not to deplore the passage of the work-relief bill. It is to deplore only the persistent shortsightedness of those in authority, which makes inevitable the perpetuation of conditions so grievous that expedients like the work-relief bill must be continually resorted to. Why must the roots of the depression—the stagnation of world commerce—remain persistently ignored?

Look at the South: In the 10 cotton States $868,300,000 will be spent to provide subsistence for 946,800 families on relief. In Texas $203,700,000 will be spent to take care of 240,860 families. Can it be presumed for a moment that priming the pump will give these unfortunate people permanent jobs in a domestic economic system when they never held such jobs even in the Nation's most prosperous years? The jobs held in the cotton fields have for decades been supplied more by the world outside the United States than by the United States itself.

It is a terrific price we are paying for the truth about simple things.

VETO

Mr. FENERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech delivered by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FENERTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following poem, composed by me, as part of an address I delivered at the annual dinner of the Clair Post of the American Legion at the Broadwood Hotel in Philadelphia on Memorial Day:

VETO

O, 'twas torture and pain from Marne to Aisne,
And cold in a dugout deep;
And the persiflage of a foe's barrage
Playfully courting sleep;
When the sad-eyed dawn said night was gone,
Then we looked for our—something canned,
There was never a chef in the A. E. F.,
Over on No Man's Land.

And when the machine guns went rat-a-tat-tat,
Nobody tried to put a veto on that!

We couldn't complain of the freezing rain
When we lived and squirmed in mud,
'Tis only a breath from life to death,
When soixante-quinzes thud;
Not a drop half clean in the caked canteen,
With the devil in chief command,
As we slept with a scowl near a rodent foul,
Over on No Man's Land.

And still the guns went rat-a-tat-tat,
Nobody thought to put a veto on that!

It was insect bite and hellish fight,
Smothered in chlorine drear,
Then over the top and a sudden stop,
And your throat felt somewhat queer,
Then a stretcher, too, with a dead poilu,
And a space where he used to stand,
Yes, and stifled cries and tear-dimmed eyes,
Over on No Man's Land.

Then once again went the rat-a-tat-tat,
Nobody ever put a veto on that!

It was over and back with a heavy pack,
And a sniff of mustard gas,
With bayonet, spade, and hand grenade
"Dig in!—they must not pass!"
So we fought and fought, great God! we fought
As long as our legs could stand,
Till the crimson flood of our comrades' blood
Was the price of No Man's Land.

Ten and seven years later no fireside chat
Can make us forget there's no veto on that!

NATURALIZATION OF ALIEN VETERANS

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 2739) to extend further time for naturalization to alien veterans of the World War under the act approved May 25, 1932 (47 Stat. 165), to extend the same privileges to certain veterans of countries allied with the United States during the World War, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to ask a question or two of the gentleman from New York.

Some of the gentlemen who are opposed to this resolution are not here at the present time, and I am sorry the gentleman has brought the matter up. I should like to know just how far this bill goes in letting in other people.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. This bill will not let anybody in from abroad; this simply provides a short form of naturalization for men who served in the World War and who were in this country at that time and are here now. It does not affect any Chinese or Japanese. They are all white people, and the bill simply extends the law that expired in 1932 in order to give these veterans of the World War the right to become naturalized, without any redtape, until May 25, 1937.

Mr. SNELL. Why should a man who served under a foreign flag have any special right to become an American citizen?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Because at the time war was declared there were a number of aliens legally in the United States, like a number of Polish young men and men from other countries, who joined to fight with the Allies in the common cause for which America fought. In other words, when we did not take these men they joined with their own folks, with whom we were allies.

Mr. SNELL. How many men are affected?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Less than 1,000.

Mr. KENNEY. I may say to the gentleman there are some substantial citizens who have come to this country since the war who lived here before the war. They volunteered to serve with their own armies at the outbreak of the war. They have come back here and now these men, especially the Polish veterans—and there is no higher type of man in this country—have recently formed an organization of their own in which these men are grouped together, and they want to take advantage of this provision. It was not known to some of them that they could have availed themselves of the law as it stood.

Mr. SNELL. Why should they not come in under the regular law?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They are legally in the country in the regular way.

Mr. SNELL. Why do they not become naturalized in the usual way?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Because they would have to wait after they file their declarations of intention for 2 years and pay a fee of $12 or $14.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are minority members of the committee present and did they know that this matter was going to be brought up today?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The committee has reported this out favorably.

Mr. CARTER. Where are the minority members of the committee?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I simply want the gentleman to take my word for the fact that the committee unanimously reported out the bill. The American Legion appeared before the committee and unanimously favored it, and the Veterans of Foreign Wars also favored it. Every group and organization of this kind has favored the legislation. It was passed in the House unanimously the last time it was up, and it passed the Senate unanimously. It only affects about 1,000 veterans who served in the war and who are legally in this country.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman has stated the committee acted on the original bill. Has the committee acted on the amendment?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The committee has agreed to the amendment which only extends the date from 1936 to 1937. Originally, the committee fixed the date at 1937 and then we eliminated that and now the Senate has put it back. This will clear up all the veterans of the World War.

Mr. CARTER. Who is the ranking minority member of the gentleman's committee?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman why these people who now want to become citizens and who were in the Army should have any different privilege in that regard than aliens who served in the Army and who were denied citizenship 10 or 15 years ago and who had to wait the regular period of time and go through the regular formalities required of all aliens.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am afraid the gentleman has not read the bill.

Mr. MOTT. Yes; I have read it.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The bill refers to people who are in this country legally and has nothing whatever to do with immigration.

In 1917, for instance, there were a number of Poles who volunteered for service in the American Army. The American Army refused to take them at the time of the first draft and then they joined their foreign service and went over on the other side to fight with our Allies and now they have been back here legally for years. This bill has nothing to do with immigration.

Mr. MOTT. I understand that, but I may say to the gentleman that for the last 10 years aliens who served in the American Army have been denied the right to become citizens in this way. They have had to go through the same procedure that anybody else followed, and why, after 15 or 16 years, should these few be given a special privilege?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. This applies to all of them.

This bill benefits aliens who served in the American Army, Navy, and other American armed forces, and also benefits aliens who served in the armed forces of countries with whom the United States was an ally in the World War, for a common cause.

Aliens who served in the armed forces under the American flag have been given the benefit of a short form of naturalization without fees ever since they were in the service up to May 25, 1934, on which date the act of May 25, 1932, expired.

Previously, our own veterans have been granted a short form under the acts of May 9, 1918, of July 19, 1919, of May 26, 1926, of March 4, 1929, of March 3, 1931, and May 25, 1932. All of these previous acts gave benefits to alien veterans who were in the United States and they were not immigration measures, just as this present bill is not an immigration measure.

Under the provisions of this bill as amended by the Senate the benefits would accrue only in cases where the formal petition for certificate of citizenship is filed with the court prior to May 25, 1937, and for that period amends and extends the pertinent section of the act approved May 25, 1932.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REVISED EDITION, HINDS' PRECEDENTS

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8297) to amend so much of the First Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1921, approved March 1, 1921, as relates to the printing and distribution of a revised edition of Hinds' Parliamentary Precedents of the House of Representatives, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the First Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1921 (41 Stat. 1181), approved March 1, 1921, as relates to the printing and distribution of a revised edition of Hinds' Parliamentary Precedents of the House of Representatives, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That Hinds' Parliamentary Precedents of the House of Representatives of the United States shall be compiled, prepared, corrected, and revised up to and including the Seventy-third Congress, by Clarence Cannon, who shall also prepare a complete index digest of the work and supervise the printing thereof; and there shall be printed and bound 2,500 sets thereof, which shall be delivered to the Superintendent of Documents for distribution as follows:

"To the offices of the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, each, five sets;

"To the Washington office of each Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner in the Seventy-fourth Congress, who makes written application therefor, one set;

"To the compiler of the revised precedents, 100 sets;

"To the Parliamentarian of the House of Representatives, 10 sets;

"To the Parliamentarian of the Senate, five sets;

"To the Secretary and Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and the Clerk, Sergeant at Arms, and Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, each, one set;

"To the offices of the superintendents of the Senate and House document rooms, each, one set;

"To the Library of Congress for international exchange and for official use in Washington, D. C., not to exceed 150 sets;

"To The National Archives, two sets;

"To each existing, or hereafter established, depository library that makes written application therefor, one set;

"To the library of each executive department, independent office, and establishment of the Government now in Washington, D. C., or which may be hereafter created, and who make written application therefor, except those designated as depository libraries, and to the libraries of the municipal government of the District of Columbia, the Naval Observatory, and the Smithsonian Institution, each, one set; and

"To the library of each branch of the legislature of every State, Territory, and insular possession of the United States, one set.

"SEC. 2. There shall also be distributed for official use, and upon delivery shall become and remain the property of the United States Government and may not be removed from the offices hereinafter designated, not to exceed 125 sets, which shall have legibly stamped on the front cover and back of each volume the name of the office to which each set is furnished, as follows:

"To the office of each standing committee of the Senate and House of Representatives now in existence, or which may be hereafter created, one set;

"To the library of the Executive Office, two sets;

"To the offices of the Legislative Counsel of the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, each, one set;

"To the library of the Senate, five sets;

"To the library of the House of Representatives, 25 sets;

"To the library of the Supreme Court of the United States, 2 sets; and

"To the offices of the Official Reporters of Debates of the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, each, one set.

"SEC. 3. The remaining sets shall be distributed by the Superintendent of Documents, as may be authorized and directed by the Joint Committee on Printing; and, after the Seventy-fourth Congress and during each succeeding Congress until the residue is exhausted, the Superintendent of Documents shall furnish, only upon written application therefor, one set to each Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner who previously had not received a set of this revised publication. The 'usual number' shall not be printed.

"SEC. 4. That the sum of not exceeding $20,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated to provide reimbursement for expenses incurred in connection with the revision of the precedents."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, this is the bill which takes care of the printing and also supplies part compensation at least to the gentleman who did the work, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. LAMBETH. It provides reimbursement for expenses in connection with this work which has been going on since 1921.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been fairly familiar with that work from the very beginning. I think Mr. CANNON has done a wonderful work, and I doubt seriously that it will ever be rewritten. Of course, Mr. CANNON took on a larger contract than he expected when he originally agreed to do the work, but he has worked faithfully for a great many years. I know no man better qualified to do the work than Mr. CANNON, and I think it is no more than right that he should be compensated at least for the extra expense that he has been put to in preparing this very valuable work.

Mr. LAMBETH. I agree with the gentleman. It is a monumental piece of work.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As the introducer of the bill, we considered thoroughly the invaluable work Mr. CANNON has done. It is probably greater than the original. I think the whole House will appreciate it when they get the new volume, one edition of which goes to each Member as I understand it.

Mr. LAMBETH. That is correct, on request.

Mr. KENNEY. When will we get that?

Mr. LAMBETH. It will be ready for distribution at the opening of the next session of Congress. It is now in the hands of the Printer.

Mr. SNELL. I am glad the Printing Committee brought this matter in, and I hope it will be disposed of at once.

Mr. LAMBETH. It was necessary to amend the original act, because the act of 1921 required that it be distributed to the Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress, and of course it is impossible to comply with that.

Mr. RANKIN. As I understand it, several volumes will be preserved for future Members who come into the Congress in future years.

Mr. LAMBETH. Nine hundred extra sets will be reserved beyond immediate distribution, which at the present rate of turn-over is expected to last for about 15 more Congresses.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

FARM-TO-MARKET ROADS

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech I made on the subject of From the Farm to Market Roads.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech made by me at Gilbert Lake, N. Y., June 8, 1935, before the rural mail carriers:

Ladies and gentlemen, I know that you are all interested, and especially you who are mail carriers, in the improvement of back roads where you have to carry mail. For many years we have had appropriations for our highways and our main thoroughfares are about all completed.

When the first bond issues were brought out in the State of New York to build and improve highways it was for the purpose of constructing a road that the farmer could get his products to market at all seasons of the year. After the bond issue was voted the legislature passed legislation for expedited routes running throughout the length and breadth of the State and farm to market roads were forgotten.

Our main thoroughfares were constructed and worn out and have been reconstructed, some of them two or three times, and they are still reconstructing main thoroughfares but the farmers' back roads are still forgotten.

At this session of Congress the Committee on Roads, of which I am a member, introduced a bill providing for an appropriation of $300,000,000 for grade-crossing elimination, $400,000,000 for main and lateral highways, and $300,000,000 for the rural mail carriers roads. Opposition grew up to this amount of money for the farmers' roads, especially from the State departments of public works, and they succeeded in getting this amount cut out of the bill and maintaining $800,000,000 in it, five hundred million for first-class and secondary roads and three hundred million for grade-crossing elimination.

Many of the States are constructing so-called "farm-to-market" roads but they are only an expensive type of gravel road and a few miles in each county so that when we got through we had made very little advancement.

With this in view and the large public-works fund of nearly a billion dollars that is now available, I proposed to appropriate $600,000,000 for constructing rural delivery and farmers' back roads. This is not entirely a road-building program but is a program to relieve the unemployed, and in relieving the unemployed I plan to do some constructive work by getting the farmers out of the mud and giving the people living in rural communities an opportunity to work and earn a living, create better living conditions, and increase the value of the farms.

If we employ an average of 50 men in every town and give them employment for 4 months building roads it will go a long way toward taking care of the unemployed under the President's plan of $50 a month. The plan is to give to every county an average of $200,000 as their needs may appear to take care of the unemployed and construct good stone and gravel roads. These roads can be constructed in this section at a cost of $1,000 to $3,000 a mile, according to the distance the material has to be drawn, and build a road that will keep the farmer out of the mud for all time, increasing the value of the farms and give work for the men who need the jobs.

We have a little over 3,000 counties in the United States, and with $200,000 to a county it would take about $600,000,000 to do this job. This would employ somewhere in the neighborhood of 3,000,000 men for 4 months or longer. The work could be started in a very short time after the money became available for most all towns and counties have the machinery to work with.

I called a meeting in my office of the following: Edward O'Neill, president American Farm Bureau Federation; Chester Gray, Washington representative American Farm Bureau Federation; Lewis Tabor, master National Grange; Fred Brinckman, Washington representative National Grange; Charles Upham, of the American Road Builders' Association; W. G. Armstrong, national president National Rural Letter Carriers' Association; and E. H. Everson, president Farmers' Union. These men are all very much interested and working for the appropriation.

Various other State organizations are endeavoring to get all of their Senators and Representatives back of the committee. There is a committee of 50 in the House of Representatives organized to help bring this about. I have been personally to see Secretary Wallace, Secretary Ickes, Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Emergency Relief Administrator; and I have been to see President Roosevelt. The President and Mr. Hopkins are very responsive, and they have told me they will render assistance to this appropriation.

Now, what we have to do is to get all these organizations and individuals together, working as one man, and your organization can help by writing these men, urging them to cooperate in bringing this about.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. ECKERT, for Wednesday, June 19, 1935, on account of business.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 19, 1935

(Legislative day of Monday, May 13, 1935)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Tuesday, June 18, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

JEAN JULES JUSSERAND—EXPRESSION OF APPRECIATION FROM GOVERNMENT OF FRANCE

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has a matter which he wishes to lay before the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a few days ago a joint resolution was passed authorizing the erection in Washington of a statue to the former French Ambassador to the United States, Mr. Jean Jules Jusserand. Through the Secretary of State there has come a communication from the French Ambassador thanking Congress for that action. I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

JUNE 13, 1935.

The Honorable JOHN N. GARNER,
Vice President of the United States.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I take pleasure in transmitting to you herewith copy of a note (in translation) which the French Ambassador left with the Under Secretary of State this morning expressing appreciation, on behalf of the French Government and the people, for the vote of the Congress authorizing the erection at Washington of a monument in memory of Mr. Jusserand, former Ambassador of France.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

(Enclosure: Copy of note.)

[Translation]

JUNE 12, 1935.

MR. SECRETARY: It was with particular satisfaction that my Government learned that the House of Representatives of the United States had unanimously adopted, on May 6 last, a resolution authorizing the erection in Washington of a monument in memory of Mr. Jusserand, late Ambassador of France in the United States, and that this resolution had been approved the day before yesterday, June 10, by the Senate.

In conformity with instructions which I have just received from the President of the Council, who is also Minister of Foreign Affairs, I have the honor to express to Your Excellency, the gratitude of the Government of the Republic for a recognition which is indeed warmly appreciated by him as well as by the French people.

I should be grateful to Your Excellency to be good enough to transmit to the Senate and to the House of Representatives an expression of the gratitude of the Republic for a vote which gives proof of the feeling of high esteem and sympathy which the American people still retains toward my eminent predecessor.

Accept, Mr. Secretary, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

ANDRE DE LABOULAYE.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 1180) to amend section 4865 of the Revised Statutes, as amended.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 59) to create a national memorial military park at and in the vicinity of Kennesaw Mountain in the State of Georgia, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2739) to extend further time for naturalization to alien veterans of the World War under the act approved May 25, 1932 (47 Stat. 165), to extend the same privileges to certain veterans of countries allied with the United States during the World War, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 7374. An act to amend section 98 of the Judicial Code to provide for the inclusion of Durham County, N. C., in the middle district of North Carolina, and for other purposes;

H. R. 8297. An act to amend so much of the First Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1921, approved March 1, 1921, as relates to the printing and distribution of a revised edition of Hinds' Parliamentary Precedents of the House of Representatives; and

H. R. 8492. An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 1121. An act for the relief of Isidor Greenspan;

S. 1863. An act for the relief of Trifune Korac;

H. R. 59. An act to create a national memorial military park at and in the vicinity of Kennesaw Mountain in the State of Georgia, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 2739. An act to extend further time for naturalization to alien veterans of the World War under the act approved May 25, 1932 (47 Stat. 165), to extend the same privileges to certain veterans of countries allied with the United States during the World War, and for other purposes.

ELECTRIC RATE SURVEY IN NEW HAMPSHIRE, NEW MEXICO, OREGON, AND UTAH

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate four letters from the Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, compilations completed through the electric rate survey of the domestic and residential rates in effect in the States of New Hampshire, New Mexico, Oregon, and Utah on January 1, 1935, which, with the accompanying papers, were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Assembly of the State of California, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Whereas there is before the Congress of the United States a measure known as "Senate bill no. 1793", which has been passed by the United States Senate, which measure, if enacted into law, will provide relief for the Indians of California by which they may recover lands taken from them by the United States in California and which provides that the courts shall determine the value of personal property, rights, and improvements mentioned in unratified treaties entered into in the years 1851 and 1852; and

Whereas the Assembly of the State of California feels strongly that the Indians of the State of California are entitled to the simple justice which this measure will afford them: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we most earnestly urge and respectfully petition the President of the United States to give this measure his favorable consideration in order that California Indians may have their case come to an early trial and the good name of the United States of America be associated with fair and honest transactions with the Indians; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be, and he is hereby, directed to forward a copy of this resolution to His Excellency, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Senators and Members of Congress representing the State of California in Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the petition of Mayor's Committee on Conference of Seaport Cities, held in New York City, N. Y., praying for the adoption of additional measures to remove trade barriers "and bring, through a revival of foreign commerce, employment and prosperity, not only to the seaport cities but to all sections of the Nation", which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the annual convention of the Western Traffic Conference of the Pacific Coast, favoring the enactment of legislation to solve existing transportation problems by rail, water, highway, and air, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted at an emergency meeting held in Cleveland, Ohio, of the National Conference of State Liquor Administrators, favoring the prompt enactment of legislation conferring upon an appropriate tribunal functions of the Federal Alcohol Control Administration concerning advertising, labeling, standards of fill, and movements of liquor in interstate commerce, to the full extent permissible under law and the Constitution, etc., which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Central Labor Union of Logan, W. Va., signed by L. H. White, its president, praying for the seating of Rush D. Holt as a Senator from the State of West Virginia, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Henry Hosbach, of Great Neck, Long Island, N. Y., remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called "Wheeler-Rayburn public-utilities bill", which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Board of Optometry of the District of Columbia, regretting the action of Congress in failing to grant proposed increases in the appropriation for public health in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

PROPOSED BANKING ACT OF 1935

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD and appropriately referred a telegram from Mr. H. B. Crandall, secretary of the Utah Bankers Association, relating to the pending banking bill.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ZION NATIONAL PARK, UTAH, June 19, 1935.

Hon. W. H. KING,
Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Our association in convention assembly unanimously passed a resolution that it was opposed to any change in the Federal Reserve System that would make political machine out of it.

H. B. CRANDALL,
Secretary, Utah Bankers Association.

Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN—ADDRESS BY ARTHUR M. HYDE

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Arthur M. Hyde, former Secretary of Agriculture, at the tomb of Abraham Lincoln, in Springfield, Ill., on June 10, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

No life in history more ennobles the common man than the life of Abraham Lincoln. The surroundings of his birth were as miserable as the manger. The circumstances of his youth were deadening. He was a failure often. The pictured face upon which we look today testifies to a soul acquainted with defeat, but calmly, serenely, confidently persevering over obstacles.

He rose above sordid circumstance. Almost wholly untutored, he made himself master of logic, language, and law. Almost undisciplined from without, his life was ordered from within by a code of duty and an ideal of service which enabled him to afford to this Nation a leadership so wise and firm, but withal so gentle, as to preserve its integrity in the hour of its supreme need.

Great principles make great men. Such principles are not necessarily new principles. They seldom spring from the Jovian brows of leaders of prestige and assured position. They are usually simplicity itself—truths as elemental as human heart throbs, which, taking hold upon the mental and spiritual consciousness of men, convert them into dynamic exemplars of great movements.

Such principles sway, build, and give direction to the lives of men. Such a principle was embodied in the Declaration of Independence. It is "that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

To give effect and implementation to that principle, the American Constitution was written; for the first time in history, it was given legal form in the Bill of Rights. In support of it, Lincoln gave his life. In this he struck hands with Thomas Jefferson, who penned it.

That men are the possessors of God-given rights, that those rights include the right to live their lives in their own way, subject only to the rights of others, the right to freely speak their own minds, to worship God in their own humble fashion, to work at tasks of their own choosing, and to collect, possess, spend, or save the fruits of their own toil as they see fit, to climb as high as their abilities, their integrity, and their industry will permit, to be captains of their own souls and masters of their own fate—and to possess these rights so inalienably that they cannot themselves barter them away, nor can their Government infringe upon them or abrogate them—these are rights so dynamic that in the century and a half since they were embodied in the American Constitution, they have overturned or modified every government then existing on earth, and humankind has made greater progress in intellectual, spiritual, and economic well-being than in all the previous centuries of history rolled together.

The embodiment of this principle of God-given, inalienable, individual rights in its Constitution and institutions is America's great contribution to the world. It is the life principle of American social, economic, and political institutions. It was the inspiration and source of the power of Abraham Lincoln.

Except for it, the life and service of Lincoln would have been impossible. He embodied in every activity that spirit of equality, that love of ordered liberty and that self-reliance under self-discipline which are the essence of the American political and social philosophy. As the passage of time strips from him the pettiness of his beginnings, the sordidness of his surroundings, and the base passions amid which and against which he struggled, his life stands forth as the great epic poem of American equality, opportunity, and liberty.

Standing at the tomb of Lincoln and in an atmosphere charged with his spirit, the mind instinctively travels back through the years in search of the men and the measures responsible for that choicest flower of liberty and opportunity—Abraham Lincoln. Three hundred years roll back, and it seems to me that in my mind's eye I can see standing upon the shores of Europe the burdened, pathetic figure of a man, limned in hopelessness against the background of centuries of regimentation by kings and dictators. He is straining his eyes anxiously across the trackless seas toward a strange new world. He is saying:

"I am one of the Old World's mongrel millions. My fathers have been clods in the realms of kings; my mothers, rags fluttering in the winds of imperial circumstance. From them have sprung the fawning henchmen of royal courts; the servile tillers of the fields of titled landlords; the cannon fodder of regal armies.

"It is ours to do the bidding of our overlords. We may think, but we dare not say our thoughts. We hear the voice of conscience, but conscience is stifled under the shadow of a state church. The divine right of kings binds us down, recruits us for armies, divides our scanty substance with royal tax gatherers.

"As we are, our grandsires were; as they were, so our grandchildren will be.

"Across the sea lies a great new country. It is a wilderness, peopled with strange red-skinned men. Life there is hard, beset with perils and privations. But a man may there hew a home from the wilderness, possess it for himself, and dying, bequeath it to his children. In that new country a man is a man in his own right. There a man is free to live his own life, answerable only to God, limited only by the rights of other men.

"I shall be a clod no longer. I want a chance for myself and my children. I may fail, but I do not fear hardship. I am going to America."

Two centuries pass. In a clearing of the forests of Kentucky stands a crude log cabin. It is cheerless, bare within and forbidding without. It speaks of the deepest poverty. Stretched upon the floor before the fireplace in the cabin lies a ragged, untaught, awkward boy, poring, by the flickering light of the blazing fire, over a borrowed book. He lifts his eyes to gaze upon the burdened form of his pioneer mother, and I hear him say:

"I am poor, unlettered Abe Lincoln. Life is hard today. Poverty and grinding circumstance make my future seem hopeless."

"My fathers came from the Old World. In this country, the clod of the Old World became a man; the fluttering rag, a woman. They fought in the American Revolution. Their souls thrilled to the declaration that all men are endowed by their Creator with the inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

"They left their blood-stained footprints in the bitter snows of Valley Forge. They helped adopt the Constitution of America. Their hearts gave allegiance to a government, not by men with their personal follies, hatreds, and ambitions, but a government by just laws which should be of equal application to all.

"Clad in coon-skin caps and leather breeches, they penetrated the wilderness. With axe in hand, and rifle nearby, they hewed logs for their cabins, cleared lands for their fields, and built homes for their children. Their eyes held a constant vision in which all men should work out their own destiny, should have the right to speak their own minds, to worship their God in their own way, to labor at tasks of their own choosing, to collect and to possess the fruits of their own toil.

"Poor, humble, Abraham Lincoln, though I am, I can work. Be the reward much or little, it will be mine. I can learn, the knowledge will give me power. I can climb; under my Government no doors are barred because I am poor. I have a chance. Thank God, I am an American."

And so saying, Abraham Lincoln, the ragged boy, rose to become the railsplitter, the country storekeeper, the small-town lawyer, the advocate of a great cause, the single-minded adherent of the American Constitution, the exemplar of individual liberty under the law, the great American President, the emancipator of a race, the defender and preserver of the American Union and of constitutional government, and the founder of a great party.

This is the triumph, in the life of one man, of a human soul given equal opportunity under liberty. Who shall say that this one life is not worth more in spiritual power, in inspiration to its fellows, and in economic well-being than all the results of all the economic planning of all tyrants, all the bureaucracies, and all the communes of history?

And we, as we stand here, members of the party which he founded, beneficiaries of a government which he preserved, can we not remember only a decade ago when we were proudly saying:

"We, too, are Americans.

"Our fathers felled the forests. They broke the sod of the prairies. They patiently laid brick on brick for a myriad of factories. From the mines they dug the metals which have bound a continent with twin ribbons of steel and with billions of wires.

"The vision of our grandfathers has been realized. A new civilization, drawing its power from the liberties and the energies of the people, has been developed; wealth has been created and spread among all the people far beyond the achievement of any nation upon which the sun ever before shone."

"The day of the pioneer, of the log cabin, of the sod house, was hard. It has passed. The children of the pioneer have builded upon his sacrifices, a Nation so fair, so just, so free that the average man in America is not only sovereign of his own soul but is joint-sovereign of the greatest Nation on earth.

"The influence of America girdles the globe—an influence which oppresses none, threatens none, inspires all. Delegations from other nations visit our ports, our cities, our industries to learn, if they can, the secrets of our progress. But not in whirling wheels, in towering cities, or in tricks of industrial organization will they find our secrets. To know them, they must search our constitutions, our laws, the hearts of our people. The secret springs of our prosperity lie in the resistless energies of 100,000,000 freemen, whose minds and souls have been unshackled by those constitutions and laws to seek life, liberty, and happiness for themselves and their posterity in their own way, to find their own place in a society of equals, to earn and to possess the fruits of their own industry.

"Our fathers, too, have kept the faith. We are the inheritors of the fairest civilization the world has yet known."

But while we might only a few years ago have said that, what of today? What of the young man who scans the future? Is his liberty safe? Is the door of equal opportunity being held open for him? Is he not saying, "Yes; I am an American.

"My country has been engulfed in a world-wide depression.

"Distress, doubt, alarm run like tidal waves through the Nation. Strident voices cry out against American institutions, liberties, principles. The history and the achievements of America are held in contempt. The Constitution is sneered at. The sacred altars of liberty are scorned as belonging to a horse-and-buggy age.

"The ancient landmarks of my country are being swept away. Economic advantage is displacing liberty as the ideal of the Nation.

"The sanctity of contract has been denied. The national honor has been repudiated. Class hatreds are being fanned to white heat. Government claims the right to plan, to order, to regiment the lives of 125,000,000 Americans. The liberties of the individual, from which this Nation drew her great strength, are being subordinated to the desires of the mass. Autocratic and dictatorial power has been massed in the hands of one man at Washington. Government is ever reaching out to take over more of the powers which our fathers refused to concede.

"The savings of the people accumulated through generations of patient toil and frugal living are being confiscated. Babies whose eyes have never been opened to the light of day must labor in the sweat of their faces to replace the appalling waste. Their tiny hands must grow into the huge, hairy hands of a disinherited Esau to lift the burdens which are being piled upon the backs of the common man. The door of opportunity is closing in the face of the young man.

"Opportunism, expediency, political temporizing—these are the policies of the day. The appetite of the mob replaces national morality in national policy. Men do not heed the voice of conscience; the sons of the pioneer look not to the rock from which they were hewn; Government does not point the road to recovery through the release of individual enterprise under liberty to rebuild the Nation. Instead, it posts its myriad of spies and inspectors to watch the business and pry into the private affairs of its citizens.

"I am an American but I am terrified, bewildered. In all the welter of distress, amid all the chaos of alien philosophies, and the wreckage of American institutions, my feet have lost the way. I can only hope that the just God who has never heretofore deserted us may somehow save us. I am weak. What can I do?"

In this, another great crisis in the life of America, we have instinctively turned our feet to the last resting place of Lincoln, here to take common counsel, here to gather inspiration and resolution that, in this hour when the very foundations of this Nation "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal" are being challenged, we shall not fail.

Other nations may take such action as fits their character. We do not envy and we shall not ape them. They may abandon liberty and fly to dictatorship. We do not join Mr. Roosevelt in his admiration of the powers of other nations, including the powers of Mussolini, Hitler, or Stalin. We would first of all preserve liberty. Let our single-minded rule of action be this paraphrase of the Lincoln letter to Greeley: "What I do * * * I do because I believe it helps to save liberty; what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help save liberty. I shall do less whenever I shall believe that what I am doing hurts the cause, and I shall do more whenever I shall believe doing more will help the cause."

With Lincoln, "let us here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

They tell us that we, as members of Lincoln's party, should write a platform which will outdeal the new deal. Is there a man here who believes Lincoln would have accepted such counsel of crass opportunism? They tell us that we should set up a coalition party to combat the sabotage of free government. Would not Lincoln tell us to declare first of all what is eternally right, and let support gather about the right because it is right? They tell us that the party of Lincoln, in defeat, has been destroyed and can no longer serve America; that it will be weak and powerless before an opposition which is entrenched behind billions of dollars of the people's savings; fortified behind a Nation-wide Tammany Hall, served by hundreds of thousands of paid henchmen.

We do not blink the difficulties. But the issue is the safety of individual liberty under free institutions. Who falters or lags deserves not the title—American.

Through the mists of the past there rises a courageous and patriotic figure. Out of the old church in Richmond there comes a voice. He is speaking to Americans in the first great exigency of American history. He is saying:

"They tell us, sir, that we are weak, unable to cope with so formidable an adversary. But when shall we be stronger? Will it be when a British guard shall be stationed in every house? Shall we acquire the means of effectual resistance by lying supinely on our backs, and hugging the delusive phantom of hope, until our enemies have bound us hand and foot? Sir, we are not weak. Three millions of people, armed in the holy cause of liberty, are invincible. The battle is not to the strong alone; it is to the vigilant, the active, the brave. If we wish to be free we must fight. I repeat it, sir, we must fight."

REGULATION OF PUBLIC-UTILITY HOLDING COMPANIES

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Philadelphia Record of Saturday, June 15, 1935, entitled "Utility Omits Dividend as Defy to Congress."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of Saturday, June 15, 1935]

UTILITY OMITS DIVIDEND AS DEFY TO CONGRESS—CRACKS WHIP ON INVESTOR IN DRIVE AGAINST WHEELER BILL—MOVE IS UNEXPECTED IN FACE OF RECENT UPWARD TREND IN EARNINGS AND SALES—STOCK DUMPING FOLLOWS ACTION—AMERICAN POWER & LIGHT PASSES PAYMENT ON PREFERRED SHARES

NEW YORK, June 14.—The desperate battle of public-utility companies against the Wheeler-Rayburn bill took a new turn today when the $800,000,000 American Power & Light System passed dividends on its preferred stocks. American Power & Light is headed by C. E. Grosbeck and dominated by the Electric Bond & Share Co.

The step, unwarranted by the company's recent reports of rising trend in earnings and electric power output, resulted in large-scale dumping of the $5 preferred and $6 preferred shares, breaking them 2½ and 3¾ points, respectively.

LAST STAND AGAINST BILL

Through its action, seen as a last stand in the company and its sponsors' fight on the regulation measure, the gigantic organization now has stricken all its stock from the rolls of dividend payers, thus depriving the vast army of individual stockholders and institutional investors interested in its preferred shares from any further remuneration.

Elimination of dividends, moreover, is seen as a strong bid of the utility industry for investor support, bringing its own private battle against regulation, the seeds of which the industry itself had sown years ago, to the doorsteps of stockholders.

Heretofore the company had been paying a small dividend on each class of preferred stocks and maintained these payments since October 1, 1932, despite declining earnings and output, for the reason that payments were within the company's reported net income.

EARNINGS GAINS SHOWN

Within the last few months the company, for the first time in several years, has been showing consistent improvement in net earnings, and electric power output, as follows:

Net earnings for the 12 months ended March 31, 1935, were equal to $2.78 a share on the combined preferred issues, compared with $2.08 in the previous 12 months, and it is estimated that in view of the increasing trend of power output this year compared with last, May and 12 months' net income will show improvement over the March results.

HAS VAST HOLDINGS

Electric Bond & Share, dominant utility holding company against which the Wheeler-Rayburn regulation bill is aimed, among others, and of which Grosbeck is also chairman, controls American Power & Light, only one of a half-dozen or more prominent utilities of the country which come under Bond & Share's wing.

Assets of Electric Bond & Share as of March 31 last totaled approximately $551,000,000, through which the vast holding company is able to exercise its influence over more than $3,000,000,000 worth of public-utility properties.

Of the 3,005,204 shares of common, 793,541 shares of $6 preferred and 978,444 shares of $5 preferred, comprising the entire stock capitalization of the American Power & Light System, Electric Bond & Share owns 51,840 shares of $5 preferred, or 5.3 percent, and 937,208 shares of common, or 31.1 percent.

CITES UNITED STATES THREAT

While this ratio of interest varies in such companies as National Power & Light, American Gas & Electric, American & Foreign Power, and Electric Power & Light, not to mention the country's less prominent utilities, in all cases it is sufficient to give Electric Bond a strong voice in the management, permitting interlocking of directorates and other power and light abuses which the Government is making a strong effort to abolish.

American Power & Light issued this statement to stockholders:

"In view of the increasing Government threat to the continued existence of your company and to the business of its subsidiaries, and notwithstanding favorable cash and earnings position, the directors, at their meeting today, decided to take no action on preferred-stock dividends at this time."

CENTRALIZATION OF POWER IN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Atlanta Constitution on Tuesday, June 18, 1935, entitled "Where Are Their Tongues?"

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Atlanta Constitution of June 18, 1935]

WHERE ARE THEIR TONGUES?

In his recent address before the farm clubs of America, Secretary of Agriculture Wallace made the bold assertion that "we are passing through times when there must be greater emphasis on the Federal Government than on the interests of the several States."

In arguing the necessity for careful study of "the question of State or Federal dominance in the field of government", he takes the further position that "if we are to have a strong Nation we must discover to what extent we must delegate powers to the individual States and to what extent keep them in Federal hands."

Secretary Wallace overlooks the fact that it is not within the province nor the power of the National Government to "delegate" to the States rights and powers that are guaranteed to them under the Constitution.

It is unfortunate that certain of the self-appointed spokesmen of the administration are pressing the subject of further centralization of power in Washington at the expense of the reserved rights of the States.

Professor Tugwell, the no. 1 "brain truster", was the original proponent of this pernicious doctrine, and Secretary Wallace and others of the dreaming theorists who are now assuming to speak for the administration have been quick to seize upon the proposal.

Fortunately, President Roosevelt has never, directly nor indirectly, committed himself to the proposition that the States be forced to surrender the rights that are reserved to them by the Constitution.

Whether or not this agitation will go as far as to bring a direct proposal of a constitutional amendment, it is certain that it would be overwhelmingly voted down by Congress.

If submitted, it would not be ratified by the States.

The President has been wise enough not to become ensnared in this dangerous mesh.

Already the Republicans are seizing upon the repeated utterances of some of the "brain trusters" as the basis of the outstanding issue of the campaign of next year. This is evidenced by the action of the so-called "grass roots" convention, in which it was boldly proclaimed that the "principle of the rights of the States will be involved in the next national campaign." It was sounded as a pean of hope that this is to be the big issue of the Presidential contest.

Nothing that the President has ever said justifies such a conclusion.

Sooner or later, however, he will undoubtedly be put in a position where he will either have to go along with the Tugwells and the Wallaces or he must disown their pernicious activities in behalf of the creation of an empire with all power lodged in Washington and with the State lines practically eliminated.

It is a dangerous step and one that the people of the country will never agree to.

Senator WALTER P. GEORGE echoed the overwhelming sentiment of the country when in his recent commencement address at Georgia Tech he said:

"The ultimate preservation of the Union depends upon the retention, unimpaired, of the dual system of government set up by the Constitution. The liberty of the citizen rests at last upon local self-government; upon local institutions administered by local authority responsive and responsible to local opinion. The decision of the Supreme Court does not call for amending the Constitution or for the surrender of the reserved powers of the States over the intimate personal business and social affairs of the people.

"The decision of the Court calls for the full assumption by Congress of its constitutional responsibility in the consideration of legislative proposals. Nothing but disaster lies ahead if those who know well the political theories of history and are yet lacking in the vital sense of the realities of life are permitted to shatter the American system of government and to attempt to remold it in accordance with their desires. It is yet our hope that these theorists, many of whom have encamped in Washington, will have their day and pass away."

In a recent editorial the Constitution called attention to the warning of Daniel Webster of the dangers of tampering with the Constitution. He said in an address on the hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth:

"Other misfortunes may be borne, or their effects overcome. If disastrous wars should sweep our commerce from the ocean, another generation may renew it; if it exhausts our Treasury, future industry may replenish it; if it desolates and lay waste our fields, still, under a new cultivation, they will grow green again, and ripen to future harvests.

"But who shall reconstruct the fabric of demolished government; who shall rear again the well-proportioned columns of constitutional liberty; who shall frame together the skillful architecture which unites national sovereignty with State rights, individual security, and public prosperity? No; if these columns fall, they will be raised not again."

Every word of this is as true today as it was when it was uttered by Webster.

Where is the master mind in the United States Senate today who will utter a similar clarion call against the radical utterances of those who, as in Webster's day, would match their untried theories against the proven efficiency of the greatest governmental document ever written?

The Senate is not lacking in men who can sound a warning as powerful as that of Webster.

But where are their tongues?

ADDRESS BY GOVERNOR EARLE BEFORE PENNSYLVANIA DEMOCRATIC STATE COMMITTEE

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a timely address delivered by Hon. George H. Earle, Governor of Pennsylvania, before the Democratic State committee, at Harrisburg, Pa., on the 18th instant.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The most vital issue before all of us today is the division of power between the Federal and State Governments.

The invalidation of N. R. A. by the United States Supreme Court, with its consequent effect upon our recovery agencies, has brought us face to face with this problem for the first time since the Civil War.

Republican spokesmen who attended the recent "grass roots" conference at Springfield, Ill., have seized upon the Supreme Court's decision as a last straw.

They have decided to go before the people with "Save the Constitution" and "State sovereignty" as their battle cries.

DANGER SEEMS OBSCURE

From what they intend to save the Constitution is most indefinite. So far as can be determined from the nebulous declarations of Republican leaders, they are opposed to any further amendment of the Constitution.

I, personally, fail to see how we can "save" the Constitution by denying our people their right to amend it. That right is grounded in the fundamental philosophy of our heritage as citizens of the Republic. It has been exercised on numerous occasions before, and there is no doubt it will be exercised again.

Any attempt to deny that right, on the ground that its exercise will destroy the Constitution is fundamentally dishonest and a threat to our civil liberties. It reflects no credit upon either the intelligence or the motives of the Republican leaders who advocate it.

The "grass roots" conference specifically went on record in opposition to any amendment which would guarantee the right of the Federal Government to legislate nationally for social security and economic reform.

RIGHT TO AMEND UNDENIABLE

Whether or not the Democratic Party commits itself to such amendment—and I do not see how it can do otherwise—we must respect and uphold the right of our citizens to amend the Constitution if they so desire.

Thomas Jefferson, the first great leader of the Democratic Party, clearly stated the case in 1816, long before the Republican Party was born. I quote:

"Some men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence and deem them like the ark of the covenant, too sacred to be touched. They ascribe to the men of the preceding age a wisdom more than human, and suppose what they did to be beyond amendment.

"We might as well require a man to wear the coat which fitted him when a boy as civilized society ever to remain under the regime of their ancestors.

"EACH GENERATION INDEPENDENT

"Each generation is as independent of the one preceding as that was of all which had gone before. It has, then, like them, a right to choose for itself the form of government it believes most promotive of its own happiness, and it is for the peace and good of mankind that a solemn opportunity of doing this should be provided by the Constitution, so that it may be handed on, with periodical repairs, from generation to generation, to the end of time, if anything human can so long endure."

It is most ironic that the Republican leaders should have gone to the last resting place of Abraham Lincoln to enunciate their doctrine of constitutional immutability.

It was Abraham Lincoln, the first great leader of the Republican Party, who said: "This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people. Whenever they grow weary of the existing Government they can exercise their constitutional right of amending it, or their revolutionary right to dismember or overthrow it."

Since the Republican Party in the past has advocated and obtained several constitutional amendments, the reasons for their sudden reversal of historic principles at this time are worthy of careful study.

INFRINGES RIGHTS OF PEOPLE

We find that they prefer to have the States rather than the Federal Government assume responsibility for national social and economic legislation. All of us know that the States, by their very nature, cannot cope with such problems individually. If economic reform is to be accomplished at all, it must be accomplished by all the States through the National Government. Consequently, it becomes clear that the real purpose of the Republican leaders is to destroy the right of the people to provide for national economic welfare.

Under such circumstances their lofty declaration of principles, embodying pledges to assure equality of opportunity and justice for the workingman, become so many empty words.

Their essential insincerity is seen further in their acceptance of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. Farmers and workers, after all, have votes—and both have profited by those agencies of the new deal. I do not see how the Republican Party can condemn the underlying principles of the new deal and at the same time accept any agency based upon those principles. If Federal control of industry is wrong, Federal control of agriculture is equally wrong.

PLEAD TOO FERVENTLY

The Republican spokesmen are pleading a little too fervently for the salvation of our Constitution. How about saving the farmer, and the jobless, and the rest of our distressed citizens? The Constitution is safe enough—it will be standing long after the Republican Party is forgotten. It is work for our people, and recovery, that we're worrying about today.

The "grass roots" declaration for State sovereignty also has a hollow ring. Most ironic is this declaration by the party of Abraham Lincoln for State rights. As we know, it was Lincoln's party which preserved the Federal Union. Would the Republican Party now destroy it?

The keynote speaker at the "grass roots" conference, curiously enough, quoted Stephen A. Douglas, one of the greatest Democrats of his time, as saying there are only two parties—"those for the Union and those against it." Where, I ask, do the Republican leaders stand today? Are they for the Union or against it? Or are they just for any catchword that promises to carry them into office?

REPUDIATED GHOST DUG UP

Their sudden about face can be attributed to nothing more or less than sheer optimism. It demonstrates the complete moral and political bankruptcy of the Republican leaders in our Nation. Their willingness to serve a few large business and industrial interests at all costs by sacrificing the security and welfare of millions of our citizens indicates that this once great party has fallen upon evil days.

From beneath the "grass roots" they have unearthed the ghost of the "old deal", the skeleton of a repudiated political philosophy, as their substitute for the great liberal and humanitarian principles of President Roosevelt.

The dark cloud of Hooverism hung ominously over that conference at Springfield, and it hangs over the Republican Party today.

The Republican spokesmen, concealing the essential hollowness of their program by resort to vague and terrifying generalities, have emerged from behind the closed doors of Springfield conference rooms with the Constitution in one hand and the Articles of Confederation in the other.

I do not believe the Democratic Party should permit itself to be forced into an untenable position by accepting the mythical "issues" manufactured by Republican leaders.

CONSTITUTION IS SAFE

All of us, whether Democratic or Republican, believe in constitutional government. If it were threatened, all of us would join in its defense. The Democratic Party has fought and will fight for our constitutional liberties—including the right to amend our Constitution.

We also believe that the rights of the States should and must be preserved. Through the years the Democratic Party has been the exponent of that principle, and it stands unchanged today.

The Democratic Party holds that there is, and rightly should be, a proper division of power possible between State and Federal Governments, and that this division must be determined by existing conditions rather than by arbitrary boundaries.

We stand firmly and unalterably against any attempt to destroy the just and necessary powers of the Federal Government under the cloak of State rights.

EXISTS TO AID THE PEOPLE

The Federal Government in the final analysis exists to promote the well-being of our people. It exists for that alone. Its power and authority come directly from the people of the several States, and it is at all times directly answerable to them.

When we refuse to give our Federal Government sufficient power to provide for the general welfare of our people, we destroy that Government by defeating the only purpose for which it exists.

The States are sovereign in their own sphere. No one disputes that—least of all the Democratic Party. But the individual States have, and can have no rights which endanger the welfare of their neighbors.

They have no right to break down living and working standards at the expense of other States. They have no right to destroy the economic life of the people of another State for their own profit.

PUTS PREMIUM ON HOSTILITY

By contending that such rights exist, the Republican Party places a premium upon hostility, and destructive competition, rather than cooperation between the States. It invites a contest of the States to determine which can offer the most intolerable working and living conditions, the most disgraceful sweatshops, the most shocking disregard of elementary decencies in the relations of labor and industry.

There can be no doubt that this is exactly the intention of those in control of the Republican Party today.

Ostensibly they are for living wages, for equal opportunity and economic freedom, and against child labor.

How are they going to get it, without national action? The answer is that they are not, and they know it. How is any one State going to abolish child labor, if its neighbor does not? How are living wages to be established if Pennsylvania has one standard and New York or New Jersey another?

G. O. P. DEALS IN PLATITUDES

What has the Republican-controlled Senate done in Pennsylvania to carry out the high-sounding platitudes of the "grass rooters"? They have buried deep beneath the grass roots of special privilege the humane labor and social justice program by the enlightened democracy of this State.

What becomes of equality of opportunity, when the States compete with each other to abolish opportunity by driving down working and living standards?

And where, I ask, is economic freedom?

If the States had been able to provide those things, we would have them today. We do not have them because the States, by their very nature, could not give them to us. We had to go to our National Government for solution of those problems.

CENTRALIZED POWER NEEDED

If we are to have constitutional government worthy of the name, and if the sanctity of State rights is to be safeguarded, we must have—as every other great nation in the world has—a national government powerful enough to provide for the welfare and security of our people.

The "grass roots" spokesmen, in proclaiming their "issues" have launched a campaign of vituperation against the President and his policies.

Where their statements are true—and in repeating historic doctrines they assert many truisms—the conclusions they draw are false. All else is propaganda.

I submit that the proof of any political philosophy is the result it produces.

The Republican Party cannot escape responsibility for bringing upon us the worst economic collapse in our history. Nor can it, by any amount of oratory or denunciation, alter in the least the fact that President Roosevelt's policies have brought this Nation back to firmer economic footing, and have placed us on the high-road to recovery.

PEOPLE HAVE NOT FORGOTTEN

Do the Republican leaders suppose our people will soon forget the chaos and despair that gripped this country on the day that President Roosevelt assumed office?

We cannot possibly forget—not so long as there is everywhere in our land the evidence of the havoc and destruction wrought by the Republican rule and Republican policies.

Closed banks, unemployment, farm riots and industrial strikes, hunger marches and universal despair—these were the fruits of Republicanism.

The policies of the reactionary elements which control the Republican Party today have taken such toll from our people that years of reconstruction will be needed to restore even a semblance of our normal life.

A return to such policies, which the "grass roots" conferees ask is absolutely unthinkable.

The position of the Democratic Party is very simple. It says, in effect—"if you are better off today than you were on March 4, 1933, or if your friends and neighbors are better off, then you must support the Democratic policies which have made that possible."

VIGILANCE NOT RELAXED

I know most of you realize that a Democratic victory in the coming national elections is certain, that if it had not been certain before, the reactionary stand of the "grass roots" conference would have assured it.

Because of that, you may be inclined now to relax your vigilance. Instead I urge all of you to do everything in your power to advance the policies which the President has put into effect.

Next year's election can be made, even more than the last, a tremendous mandate to extend and amplify our great recovery agencies, to establish economic reforms, and to give our country the position of leadership which it justly deserves among the progressive nations of the world.

In this Commonwealth, comprising 10 percent of our country's population and representing 10 percent of its wealth, we must join in the great task that lies ahead. The whole is greater than the part. The national administration is doing its part. Let us do ours.

SOCIAL SECURITY

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 7260) to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment-compensation laws; to establish a Social Security Board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the amendment which has been offered by my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is to be voted on at 1 o'clock, and inasmuch as the Senator from Missouri desires to conclude the argument on his own amendment, I promised him not to occupy all the time; and I have no desire to do it independent of that in order that I may extend to him the courtesy to which he is entitled as the author of the amendment.

There are so many things involved in the amendment which is now before us that I could not hope to call attention to all of them in the space of time which I shall occupy. We have heard a good deal of discussion here on the pending bill and in connection with the amendment, in which the fear has been expressed that the bill itself is of doubtful constitutionality, and the intimation is that we ought to vote against it on that account.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The fear, as I understand, is with reference to title II; but does not the Senator think that title II might be held to be unconstitutional without affecting the other portions of the bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I think the various titles of the bill are separable. The point that I have in mind at this particular juncture is that, if it be true that there is any part of this measure concerning the constitutionality of which there is doubt, that doubt ought not to be increased by adding an amendment such as that which is now before the Senate.

We have heard the Federal Government berated and denounced here on the floor as if it were a sort of monster; we have heard it talked about as if it were a sort of glacier, gigantic in proportions, crawling along the surface of the earth and crushing everything with which it comes in contact, and that, because it is a monster, because it is constantly reaching its hands out to crush somebody or to rob somebody of authority, we ought to vote against this measure and all similar measures which are brought forward for our consideration.

I do not entertain that conception of the Federal Government. The same people who pay taxes into the State treasuries pay taxes into the Federal Treasury; the same people who are citizens of the States are citizens of the United States; and I look upon our National Government rather as a benevolent organization than as a ruthless organization seeking all those whom it may devour. Certainly in its effort to relieve economic insecurity by providing some universal and uniform way by which we may eliminate the hazards of old age, of unemployment, and of illness, our National Government takes on the qualities of a benevolent government and not of a despotic or ruthless government.

We have had our attention called to the decision of the Supreme Court in the famous case sometimes referred to as the "sick chicken" case, sometimes as the "chicken coop" case, and other derisive terms which have been applied to it. I think it is unfortunate that the decision as to the legality of N. R. A. had to arise on a case involving the plucking of chickens out of a coop, because it seems to be a trivial situation; but the Supreme Court went into it in detail and therefore I have no disposition to treat it in a trivial way.

I believe there is no question that the Congress has the power to levy the tax which is proposed to be levied under the pending bill. I am not concerned with fear as to the constitutionality of title II, which can only be doubted on the ground that we are invading a field which was reserved to the States or the people; but I do not see any difference in principle between appropriating billions of dollars to be given to unemployed men and women all over the United States in an emergency to keep them from starving and freezing and appropriating money out of the Treasury in an orderly way to provide against the existence of such an emergency in the future.

We need not grow fearful that the foundations of our Government are going to crumble because the Supreme Court on one day rendered three decisions, two of which nullified acts of the Federal Congress, one being the N. R. A. case, the other involving the Frazier-Lemke Act, which was passed by Congress and was not, strictly speaking, a part of the new deal, as it has been assumed that all these decisions were rendered against the new deal, and the third having to do with exercise of the power of dismissal on the part of the President.

It might be interesting for Senators to recall that from 1789 to 1859 the Supreme Court rendered only 2 decisions nullifying acts of Congress. From 1860 to 1869 it rendered 4 decisions nullifying acts of Congress; from 1870 to 1879 it rendered 9 decisions nullifying acts of Congress; from 1880 to 1889 there were 5 such decisions; from 1890 to 1899 there were 5 such decisions; from 1900 to 1909 there were 9 such decisions; from 1910 to 1919 there were 7 such decisions; from 1920 to 1929 there were 19 such decisions; from 1930 to 1932 there were 3 such decisions; and from 1933 to 1935, both inclusive, there were 7 such decisions, which involved only 6 acts of Congress. So that from 1920 to 1929, a period of 10 years, the Supreme Court nullified, in all 19 decisions, acts of Congress, but no one was then fearful that because of that fact Congress had ceased to function or that the Supreme Court had arrogated to itself the powers of government.

No one thought the foundations of our Government were about to crumble; yet because during the last 5 years the Supreme Court has rendered 10 decisions in which it nullified acts of Congress, 7 of which have been rendered within the last 3 years, we are cautioned not to vote for anything that even implies a position near the border line, lest we may do something that is unconstitutional.

Mr. President, my objection to the Clark amendment is that it sets up two competitive systems of old-age relief. I believe one of the wisest things the Nation has done has been to recognize the duty of the Government toward indigents. Whether the indigent condition be brought about by unemployment or old age or ill health, there is no way by which the public can escape the burden. It is always present in one form or another. Those who work must support those who do not work. It has always been so, and it will always be so. With respect to reduction of hours of labor, my theory has been that if we must decide whether all our people should be allowed to work three-fourths of the time or three-fourths of them should be allowed to work all the time and the other one-fourth never work at all, I prefer the first alternative so as to divide whatever work is available among all the able-bodied men and women of the country who desire to work, so they may share it in proportion to their ability, rather than that we shall have a permanent condition in this country in which three-fourths of the people shall be allowed to work all the time and one-fourth never to work at all, and therefore become burdens upon the three-fourths who shall be allowed to work. That is the reason why I favor reduction in hours of labor, insofar as we can do that, in order to spread the work which is available among all the people capable of working.

I feel the same way with respect to the provisions for old-age pensions and unemployment insurance. That is why I believe in this measure, worked out by a commission appointed a year ago by the President at the time he sent his message to Congress announcing that at this session he would propose a constructive plan of legislation to deal with this complicated and interrelated situation. After months of investigation and months of labor that commission brought out a tentative plan, which was submitted to the Houses of Congress, and both Houses, through their committees, held exhaustive hearings on the subject. The House of Representatives finally passed a bill, I believe, in much modified form. Our Committee on Finance gave weeks and months of study to this problem, and has brought here a bill proposing a uniform and universal plan to apply to our country.

Abraham Lincoln once said this country cannot endure half slave and half free. I do not believe any old-age pension system we may inaugurate can long endure half public and half private, because if we have private insurance or annuity plans set up in opposition to the plan of the Federal Government, it is not difficult to see that the high-pressure salesmanship of annuity companies and of insurance companies will always be on the doorsteps of the employers to convince them that they can insure their employees in a private system more cheaply than they can by the payment of taxes into the Federal Government and a consequent dispensation of the benefits in an orderly and scientific fashion.

Therefore I believe the effect of the Clark amendment—and I am sure, of course, the Senator from Missouri was not actuated by any such design or desire—will be to disorganize and disarrange the reserve fund set up in the Treasury under the Federal plan, and that it will gradually and effectually undermine the Federal system which we are trying to set up. We will then have our Government in competition with every annuity writer and every employer in the country who thinks he may be able to save a little money by insuring his employees or by adopting some private annuity plan which may be suggested to him by some private insurance company or annuity company which desires to obtain the business.

As the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] said yesterday, the employers of the United States have not asked for this amendment. Only one employer of labor came before our committee and suggested it. He was a representative of the Eastman Kodak Co., of Rochester, N. Y., which for many years has had a very commendable system of private annuities for its employees. The only other man who came before the committee to suggest the amendment was a man who represents an annuity company which desires to write policies for employers throughout the United States.

The question which we are to settle when we vote on the Clark amendment at 1 o'clock is whether we are to have a Federal system uniform in its application all over the United States or whether we are to have a spotted system, part Federal and part private.

The argument has been advanced here that failure to adopt the amendment would rob the States of some rights to which they are entitled. The argument has even been made that the enactment of this bill into law will rob the States themselves of some right under the theory of State rights. I believe in State rights. I was schooled in the doctrine of State rights. I come from a section of the country and I belong to a political organization one of whose cardinal doctrines has always been the preservation of the rights of the States. But while I am in favor of State rights, I am also opposed to State wrongs.

We take nothing away from any State in this measure. There is nothing here which interferes with the right of any State to pass its own old-age-pension laws and its own old-age annuities or any other form of old-age relief which the State legislature, through the representatives of the people, may desire to enact. We not only take away from the States no right which they enjoy but we take away from no employer any right which he enjoys. He may continue his private plan if he desires; and if he is so generous as not to be satisfied with what the old people who work for him or his concern for the able-bodied years of their lives are to get out of this bill, he may supplement that by adding to it, or inaugurating a private system of his own which will give them more than they will be able to obtain under the bill as we have it here.

My contention is, however, that we cannot safely take away from this uniform, universal system which we are trying to establish here the universality and the uniformity of its application by holding out an invitation or an encouragement to private individuals to impinge upon the system set up by the Federal Government, and utterly to destroy its reserve fund, and thereby break down its application, because the Federal Government will be compelled to bear the burden of it on the seamy side, while private employers may so manipulate their employment as to age as to have a large majority of younger men who would not be an immediate burden upon them, while shifting to the Federal Government all of the older employees whom they do not desire to carry on their rolls because of the greater burden that might be attached to payment of annuities to them over a term of years.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am much impressed by the statement of the Senator from Kentucky. In connection with it, I ask his attention to the proviso on page 4 of the Clark amendment, to which, as I view the amendment, not enough attention has been directed.

Under that proviso, with which the Senator from Kentucky doubtless is familiar, if an employee leaves private employment prior to reaching 65 years of age, the duty falls upon the employer to pay to the Treasury of the United States an amount equal to the taxes which otherwise would have been payable by the employer, plus 3 percent per annum, compounded annually. Since we are dealing with insurance principles, is the Senator prepared to tell the Senate why the payment to be made at such a time is not based on actuarial standards, which would result in a larger payment by the employer than the amount provided for in the Clark amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, I am not able to answer the question of the Senator, because I do not know why it was not based upon actuarial facts and upon actuarial investigations.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I do not desire to take the Senator's time; and I shall be glad to have the Senator make up out of my time the amount of time consumed by this interruption.

The question is very simple to answer. The provision was included in that form to meet the objection which was made in the committee that the employee might be the loser at any time by transferring from a private fund to the Government fund. The provision was put in the amendment in this form to insure that an employee who, either from his own wishes or from any other cause, transfers at any time from a private fund to the Government fund will certainly not be any worse off than if he had been in the Government fund all the time.

Mr. BARKLEY. That leads me to discuss another matter which I think is very serious and will be very difficult to administer.

The amendment of the Senator from Missouri provides, of course, that the board shall approve these plans. It must keep constantly in touch with each of them, not only as to the plan as a whole but as to every single employee of any concern, however large the number may be. In other words, if the employment of any man is terminated under the terms of this amendment, whether by his own voluntarily act or by the act of his employer, the board in Washington must investigate the relationship of that employer to that employee; and it is conceivable that it would take an army of inspectors and investigators running all over the United States to innumerable places to which they would be called every time a man terminated his employment, either on his own account or on account of his employer, to ascertain the relationship between the employer and the employee at the time of the termination, and at the same time investigate the employee's rights under the private plan and under the Federal plan, if he had any rights under the Federal plan.

Talk about bureaucratic government, and about snoopers going around all over the country to investigate everything! There would have to be an investigation, if there was any controversy over it, every time a man quit his work or was discharged, as to his rights under his agreement with his employer, or under the law under which he operated.

That brings me to the discussion of another matter which seems to me to add to the doubtful constitutionality of the bill if this amendment should be adopted.

In the child-labor case the Supreme Court practically held that an effort on the part of Congress to levy a tax on the products of a factory intended for interstate commerce, provided they employed children in the manufacture of the product, was the same as fixing a penalty upon any concern that employed child labor. They held that that was unconstitutional for that reason, as well as for other reasons which they assigned.

In the case of this amendment, if the same controversy should arise, and the Court should take the same view of it—that the tax imposed here would be in the nature of a penalty against every concern that did not have a private plan of annuity for the benefit of its employees—of course, the act might be held unconstitutional on that ground.

To me, however, there is even a more serious objection to the amendment on constitutional grounds. The Constitution provides that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States. Of course, that does not mean that we have to levy a given tax on everybody in the country. We have always recognized the right of Congress to establish classifications for the purposes of taxation. We do it in all of our revenue laws. We set up classes which shall pay a certain amount of taxes, and other classes which according to the law will be taxed in a different way; but I do not recall any act of Congress or any decision of a court where it has been held that after fixing these classifications Congress can lift some persons out of the classifications and exempt them from taxes altogether. That is what this amendment would do. It says to every concern and every factory, it says to all those who are subject to it, "You will pay this tax unless you inaugurate a private annuity system of your own. If you do that, you are not required to pay the tax which everybody else in your class will be required to pay."

I seriously doubt whether Congress has any such power as that under the Constitution. Certainly, in my judgment, that would violate the rule of uniformity which the Constitution requires with respect to taxes levied upon all classes and different classes which Congress proposes by its laws to attempt to tax. Certainly there would be enough doubt about it to add to the doubtfulness of the constitutionality of the act as a whole, if there is any serious doubt as to its constitutionality, which I have not the time now to argue at length, because I have promised the Senator from Missouri to leave him 20 or 25 minutes in order that he may close this argument in behalf of his own amendment.

But, regardless of constitutionality, regardless of any question of technicality, regardless of all the legal technicians who may be brought forward in behalf of this proposal, my earnest belief is that it is unwise as a matter of policy to divide this great scheme which has been devised in our country—a belated scheme, I will say, compared to the legislation of other civilized nations, some of which was inaugurated half a century ago, most of which has been in operation for a quarter of a century. It has taken us a long time to march up the hill toward the consideration of our duty to those who have served society, and in many cases have rendered as valuable service to the world as the man who shoulders a musket or goes to war in support of his flag or his Constitution. It has taken us a long time to conceive of it as our duty as a government to do something to recognize, in an organized and regular and orderly way, the duty of society to its aged and to its unemployed and to its indigent, those who have served their day and have passed on beyond the power of service, beyond any capability so far as they are concerned to make their declining years happy and comfortable. I congratulate the Congress of the United States, I congratulate the American Government, I congratulate men of both political parties in this Chamber and in the other Chamber, that at last we have come to recognize the fact that society as a whole, in its organized form, owes an obligation to these men and women which cannot be discharged by mere lip service, but can be discharged in a practical way only by the enactment of workable, practicable plans to apply to all alike and to all sections of the country with equal force, as we have attempted to provide in the bill now before the Senate.

I think the Senate and the Congress will rue the day on which this amendment shall be agreed to, and thereby the strength of our enactments be weakened, and the power of the National Government be weakened in dealing with unemployment and old-age problems.

For these reasons, I sincerely hope the amendment will be defeated. However much I regret to oppose any amendment put forward by my lifelong friend the Senator from Missouri, however much respect I have for his views and for the sympathetic heart which I know he possesses, nevertheless, I believe he is wrong in principle and in policy in this case, and I believe it would be a serious mistake to adopt the amendment; and I, therefore, trust that it will be rejected.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, no careful and intelligent observer in these unhappy times can have failed to note that in the last 10 or 12 years there has been an essential change, if not in the form of our Government, at least in its substance, and can have failed to observe that this has ceased to be a government in which legislation is by congressional consideration and vote, but has become a government by experts.

There was quite a long period following the foundation of the Government down to a recent date when Senators and Representatives considered it their duty under the Constitution to formulate legislation on their own responsibility, under their oaths of office, to consider that legislation in the light of their own views, and to cast their votes on the enactment of the legislation in accordance with those views. That situation existed until a period not so long ago. During that time Senators and Representatives considered it to be their duty to take active part in the formulation of legislation. But under the system which has grown up in the last 10 or 12 years, a man who feels himself qualified to participate in the formulation of legislation, to have any voice in its formulation, should not offer himself for election to the Senate or the House of Representatives, but he should procure for himself a position as a member of some commission, or as an employee of some commission or as an employee or agent of some bureau of the Government.

Until very recently these experts were satisfied to go over legislation proposed to be enacted, in private, with the Senators who were to introduce it and sponsor it, and quietly to let it be known that it was legislation sponsored by the commission or the bureau, as the case might be. In more recent practice the experts come to the committees, in executive sessions of the committees, and the experts come upon the floor of the United States Senate in droves.

In the consideration of the particular bill now before us, when the bill was finally reported out of the Finance Committee I think it is no exaggeration to say that there were three times as many experts in attendance in that supposed executive session of the committee as there were Senators present to vote on the bill, a measure which puts a larger charge upon the taxpayers of the United States than any bill ever heretofore introduced.

During the consideration of the bill on the floor of the Senate the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has from the beginning been flanked by two experts, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has had a private expert of his own, and the seats in the back of the Chamber have been occupied by experts of various kinds. So it is with some trepidation that a mere Senator of the United States rises to appeal to his colleagues in this body, and to differ from the opinions of this galaxy of experts.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not recall when a single general tariff bill has been enacted during my membership in the two Houses of Congress when there were not clerks and various experts sitting by the chairmen of the committees in both Houses to furnish information with respect to the measure as it went along.

Mr. CLARK. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that of course the rule of the Senate provides for clerks of committees being admitted to the floor, but I have searched in vain—although I am not complaining about this matter—for any authorization for representatives of various commissions and various bureaus to be on the floor of the Senate. I am making no point of that, however.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought the Senator was.

Mr. CLARK. I am simply laying the foundation for some remarks which I now desire to make.

I do not desire to criticize these experts; they are honest men, for the most part, wedded to their own ideas, but it seems to me that when the time has come that the Senate of the United States cannot consider measures on its own responsibility without any more effective argument being made against a measure than that this corps of experts does not approve it, this country has come to a pretty pass.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CLARK. I will in just a moment. In other words, it seems to me that there may be very grave suspicion that the real objection of these experts to this amendment and to other suggestions for changes in the proposed act which have been advanced may bear a very close analogy to President Grant's remark about Senator Charles Sumner. It is related that on one occasion someone told President Grant that Sumner did not believe in the Bible, and Grant replied, "Yes, damn him; that is because he didn't write it." That is the attitude of many of these experts regarding many of the measures brought on the floor of the Senate.

I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to ask the Senator a question. We are dealing always with a very practical situation. Back in the days when legislation was simple it was easy, of course, for the Senators and the Members of the House of Representatives to deal more at large with the details of legislation. I recall the act creating the Federal Trade Commission which I helped to write as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, and that was a very short act. But as the problems of the Government have multiplied and our society has become more complex, members of both branches of the National Legislature and of branches of all legislatures everywhere have found it more necessary to acquire accurate information in order to guide them in the matter of legislation.

We will adjourn in a few weeks and go home. We will be at home I hope the remainder of this year. We do not have our minds on legislation when we are at home, we are not writing bills. We are glad to get away from the humdrum and the burden of legislation.

When we come back in January, what harm will come if the President shall appoint some commission to look into a situation which may require legislation when we reassemble, and if such commission shall have gathered a volume of information for our assistance and guidance in the matter of legislation? What harm is there even if some gentlemen have suggested a tentative draft of a bill, which we have the right to change, as in this case we have changed the bill materially from what it was when it came to us?

Mr. CLARK. Evidently I have not been able to make myself clear to my distinguished friend from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am sure that is my fault.

Mr. CLARK. No one complains about the furnishing of information to any committee of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, or to either body itself. What I am complaining about is the assumption of infallibility by this body of experts.

Mark now, how a plain tale shall put my friend down. The first draft of the bill before us was produced after 6 months of work under direction of a stellar array of technical, medical, public-health, hospital, dental, and child-welfare officials.

The bill was prepared, and some 2 or 3 weeks later the experts of the Treasury Department advised a multitude of very radical changes in the bill, which were accepted almost without exception.

Since then experts advisory to the committees in the House and in the Senate have brought about many further modifications, and it is only now, at the last minute, after all this multitude of changes, that the opinion of these experts suddenly becomes infallible, and in the face of this they now maintain that the Federal plan as now contained in the bill has suddenly achieved such perfection as to justify the wiping out of benefits of all private plans in favor of a Government compulsory plan, which will probably again be changed by the experts.

Mr. President, I have only a few minutes remaining, but I desire as briefly as possible to state why I think my amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the subject he has been discussing, I wish he would not overlook what the Senator from Kentucky has pointed out, that as these experts continue to compile our laws the Government becomes more complex and complicated, and needs more experts.

Mr. CLARK. That is unquestionably true.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator will yield, of course, that is not what I said at all, and the Senator from Louisiana knows it is not what I said. He got the cart before the horse, as he always does.

Mr. CLARK. I do not desire to have the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Louisiana engage in a controversy in my time, because I have only 13 minutes left.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon——

Mr. CLARK. I must decline to yield, because I have some serious thoughts I desire to present to the Senate.

The statement was made by the Senator from Mississippi in the course of the debate—and I know in good faith, because it was based on the testimony of one of the experts, to which I myself listened—that there is no private pension plan more generous and more beneficial to the employee than the Government plan.

Mr. President, the expert who made that statement before the Finance Committee, the principal opponent before the committee of the amendment which is soon to be voted on, was M. W. Murray Latimer. He is the inventor, or the chief proponent, at least, of the contention which has been advanced here on the floor that the adoption of the pending amendment would lead to discrimination against the older type of employees and the laying off of employees at a fixed or earlier age. Yet the same Dr. Latimer, before he became an expert testifying in the executive sessions of the Finance Committee, when he was speaking in public on the stage at Cleveland in January 1930 to the American Management Association, used this language:

> Talk of general retiring age limit in any industry is sheer myth.

There has been quite a change in Dr. Latimer's position between the time he appeared independently on his own responsibility in public and when he appeared in a secret session of the Finance Committee as one of the experts of two of these committees.

Mr. President, it is said that there are no private plans which are more beneficial than the plans set up by the Government under this bill. I read to the Senate yesterday a brief description of the plan of one company which now contributes 4½ percent to a benefit fund as against 3 percent contributed by the employees, and which, in addition to certain other benefits, provides in the plan an insurance policy of the face value of 1 year's salary for each employee.

I now desire to place in the RECORD, Mr. President, some other advantages in other private plans. What I shall state is by no means comprehensive, but it is merely illustrative. Many companies under private plans provide that earlier retirement for women may be had, or that there may be special disability retirement.

Companies which normally retire women at age 60, as against the Government plan of retirement at age 65, are, among others, the American Insurance Co., the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., the Clark Thread Co., the Eastman Kodak Co., the General Foods Corporation, the Rochester Gas & Electric Corporation, and the Standard Oil Co. of Ohio.

Plans which retire disabled men before age 65, which is a feature strictly forbidden under this Government plan, among others, are the Boston Consolidated Gas Co., which permits retirement at any age after 15 years' service; the Electric Storage Battery Co., which permits retirement at any age after 15 years' service; the International Harvester Co.; the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey; and the United States Steel Corporation.

Plans which retire men, not disabled, before age 65 after a specified length of service, among others, are Armour & Co., Commonwealth Edison Co., Spool Cotton Co., and the Standard Oil Co. of California.

Mr. President, the trouble with these experts is that they take their model from the ancient highwayman of old Attica, Procrustes, whose custom it was, so we are told in fable, to overpower wayfarers passing along a certain route and compel them to lie upon a bed which he had specially constructed. Those wayfarers who happened to be too short to fill up the bed had their legs stretched out to the length of the bed, and those unfortunates whose legs happened to be longer than the bed had their legs hacked off. That is the principle of the experts with reference to this bill in opposing such an amendment as that which I have proposed. Where the legs of any private plan are too short to fit the model which the Government has made, no one has any objection to having those legs stretched out; but it seems more than passing hard and passing unfair to require the legs of those companies which happen to have more generous plans, which happen to be too long for the bed, to be hacked off, more particularly when the length of leg hacked off would be for the benefit of the employees concerned.

Mr. President, it was stated by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] yesterday and by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] a while ago that no employers or employees were concerned about the passage of this amendment. I know that they both made that statement in good faith, but, for their information, I should like to say to them that I have on my desk here letters from more than 75 employers now having plans more beneficial to the employees than the Government plan, who protest against having their plans wiped out.

It was stated that the adoption of this amendment would ruin the structure of the bill. That certainly has not always been the opinion of these experts, because in the March-April 1935 number of the Manager's Magazine, Dr. E. E. Witte, who sits upon the floor of the Senate as the adviser of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], used this language:

> At the present time, there is no exemption offered to the employer who has already embarked on a plan of private annuities, either with a life-insurance company or by some other means. If those insurance companies underwriting such cases were to offer a reasonable amendment to the pending bill urging an exemption for such employers, it might be accepted. There would probably be two points insisted upon, however, by our committee or by the Social Insurance Board set up under the bill, namely, (1) the ability of the insurer to guarantee security of the fund, and (2) the transferability of the amount vested in the employee in case he leaves his present employer.

Mr. President, both of those features are completely covered in the amendment which I have proposed, and I read that statement simply for the purpose of showing that the statement which has been repeated here on the floor by various Senators that the adoption of this amendment would ruin the whole structure of the bill is apparently entirely without foundation; at least it was not recognized by one of the chief experts of the committee, Dr. Witte.

In closing, I simply desire to emphasize the fact that Senator after Senator in opposition to this amendment has made the statement that the adoption of this amendment, providing for the retention of private pension plans, would redound to the disadvantage of the older employees; and yet, although the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and others have been requested to point out wherein that was possible, not one of them has been able to lay his finger on the manner in which that would be possible and to justify the statement.

The fact is that this amendment, in its present form, containing the provision that the contribution to the fund by any employer shall not be less than the amount of the tax, makes it absolutely impossible for any employer to profit to the extent of one penny by having younger employees. The only effect of cheaper insurance by reason of younger employees would be to enable the employer to purchase larger annuities, which would redound to the benefit of the employee and not of the employer.

The provisions of this amendment make it absolutely certain that the employee can leave the private pension system at any time at his option and go into the Government system, taking with him not less than the amount which would have been to his credit in the Government fund if he had been under the Government fund from the very beginning.

Therefore I submit it is not to the interest either of the public or of the employers to penalize employees who now are under the more liberal pension systems than that proposed to be set up by the Government plan. It is not to the interest of the public to prohibit forward-looking employers who are anxious to be more generous to their employees than would be the system provided in this bill. I point out further that under the provision of the amendment the conditions of the private plan must be such as to meet the approval of the board to be set up under this bill for the administration of the whole bill, and that under this amendment the duty is imposed on that board in the future to follow up the operations of the various private pension plans, and to insure their conformance to the conditions set forth in the amendment.

I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will not the Senator be generous enough to withhold his suggestion of the absence of a quorum in order that I may utilize the remaining time before 1 o'clock in order to read a letter into the RECORD?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield the remainder of my time to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, yesterday I made the statement that I was authorized to declare that the American Federation of Labor was opposed to this amendment. I shall take the opportunity of using the remaining minutes to read a letter which I received from Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, addressed to myself, dated June 19, 1935, as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., June 19, 1935.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr.,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The American Federation of Labor is unalterably opposed to the Clark amendment to H. R. 7260, the social-security bill. The amendment proposes to continue in operation private insurance schemes in effect in various industries. This would exempt these industries that have old-age-pension plans from paying the tax provided in the bill.

It is well known that the management of many industries discharge employees when they approach the retirement age. Information was given the Senate that in the packing industry, for instance, the private insurance plan has been a success. It must not be forgotten that a few years ago when the packing plants of Nelson Morris & Son were sold to Armour & Co. the insurance plan in effect in the former's plants was canceled. Although many employees had contributed for many years to the insurance plan, they never received a penny in return after the sale of the company to Armour & Co.

Another great objection to private pension plans is that it tends to discourage the employment of older men. Men more than 40 years of age are refused employment. There is no hope for them except through the enactment of the national-security bill.

There are many reasons why the Clark amendment should be defeated. It would prevent many thousands of persons over 65 years of age ever receiving old-age pensions. On the other hand, if the security bill is passed as written, those entitled to old-age pensions will receive them.

Private insurance plans were originated in industries which objected to the employees joining trade unions. It was an incentive to the organization of company unions which gave the industries complete control over their employees.

Therefore the American Federation of Labor can see nothing to the advantage of the workers in exempting private insurance plans in the proposed law.

Yours very truly,

WM. GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into yesterday, the Senate will now vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	King	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Coolidge	La Follette	Reynolds
Austin	Copeland	Lewis	Robinson
Bachman	Costigan	Logan	Russell
Bailey	Dickinson	Lonergan	Schall

Byrnes	Hastings	Nye	Wagner
Capper	Hatch	O'Mahoney	Walsh
Caraway	Hayden	Overton	Wheeler
Chavez	Johnson	Pittman	White
Clark	Keyes	Pope

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

The amendments offered by Mr. CLARK are as follows:

On page 15, after line 25, to insert the following:

"(7) Service performed in the employ of an employer who has in operation a plan providing annuities to employees which is certified by the board as having been approved by it under section 702, if the employee performing such service has elected to come under such plan; except that if any such employee withdraws from the plan before he attains the age of 65, or if the board withdraws its approval of the plan, the service performed while the employee was under such plan as approved shall be construed to be employment as defined in this subsection."

On page 43, lines 17 and 18, add the following new paragraphs:

"(b) The board shall receive applications from employers who desire to operate private annuity plans with a view to providing benefits in lieu of the benefits otherwise provided for in title II of this act, and the board shall approve any such plan and issue a certificate of such approval if it finds that such plan meets the following requirements:

"(1) The plan shall be available, without limitation as to age, to any employee who elects to come under such plan: Provided, That no employer shall make election to come or remain under the plan a condition precedent to the securing or retention of employment.

"(2) The benefits payable at retirement and the conditions as to retirement shall not be less favorable, based upon accepted actuarial principles, than those provided for under section 202.

"(3) The contributions of the employee and the employer shall be deposited with a life-insurance company, an annuity organization, or a trustee approved by the board.

"(4) Termination of employment shall constitute withdrawal from the plan.

"(5) Upon the death of an employee, his estate shall receive an amount not less than the amount it would have received if the employee had been entitled to receive benefits under title II of this act.

"(c) The board shall have the right to call for such reports from the employer and to make such inspections of his records as will satisfy it that the requirements of subsection (b) are being met, and to make such regulations as will facilitate the operation of such private annuity plans in conformity with such requirements.

"(d) The board shall withdraw its approval of any such plan upon the request of the employer, or if it finds that the plan or any action taken thereunder fails to meet the requirements of subsection (b)."

On page 52, after line 7, add the following new paragraph:

"(7) Service performed by an employee before he attains the age of 65 in the employ of an employer who has in operation a plan providing annuities to employees which is certified by the board as having been approved by it under section 702, if the employee has elected to come under such plan, and if the Commissioner of Internal Revenue determines that the aggregate annual contributions of the employee and the employer under such plan as approved are not less than the taxes which would otherwise be payable under sections 801 and 804, and that the employer pays an amount at least equal to 50 percent of such taxes: Provided, That if any such employee withdraws from the plan before he attains the age of 65, or if the board withdraws its approval of the plan, there shall be paid by the employer to the Treasurer of the United States, in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, an amount equal to the taxes which would otherwise have been payable by the employer and the employee on account of such service, together with interest on such amount at 3 percent per annum compounded annually."

Mr. CLARK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULKLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who is necessarily absent from the city. I understand that a special pair has been arranged for him on this vote, which leaves me free to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I am advised that if he were present he would vote "yea", and, as I intend to vote the same way, I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. NYE (after having voted in the negative). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." Under the circumstances I withdraw my vote.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] is necessarily absent. He is paired on this question with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS]. If present, the Senator from Wyoming would vote "yea", and the Senator from Utah would vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] are unavoidably absent, and that the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] is detained on important public business.

I desire to announce the following pair on this question:

The Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN]. I am not advised how either Senator would vote if present.

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—51

So Mr. CLARK's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 4, line 21, after the comma, to insert " and (2) an amount, which shall be used exclusively as old-age assistance, sufficient to make the Federal contribution with respect to each such individual for each month in the quarter $30."

On page 4, line 21, strike out "(2)" and insert "(3)."

On page 4, line 22, strike out " amount " and insert " amounts."

On page 5, lines 5 and 6, strike out " clause (1)" and insert " clauses (1) and (2)."

On page 5, line 10, after " clause " insert "(1)."

On page 5, line 24, strike out " clause (1)" and insert " clauses (1) and (2)."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the principle of the amendment was discussed somewhat at length some days ago. The amendment would make it certain that all persons 65 years of age and over shall receive $30 per month. The amendment is, on page 4, line 21, after the comma, to insert the following:

And (2) an amount, which shall be used exclusively as old-age assistance, sufficient to make the Federal contribution with respect to each such individual for each month in the quarter $30.

In other words, if the State shall provide $15, the National Government shall provide $15. If the State shall provide $10, the National Government shall provide $20. The object and purpose of the amendment are to assure that not less than $30 shall be provided for those 65 years of age or over.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senaor from New York?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. If the State should appropriate nothing, would the Federal Government then contribute $30 to the individual? Is that the Senator's idea?

Mr. BORAH. No. If the contribution of the State should be absolutely nothing, then the Federal Government would contribute absolutely nothing; but if the State should provide $5 or $10, the National Government would contribute an amount which would make the total $30.

Mr. WAGNER. If the State should contribute only $1, then the Federal Government would contribute $29?

Mr. BORAH. That is quite correct. But I do not accept the theory that the States will not do all they are able to do. The people of the States are just as humane and just as willing to take care of their aged as is the Congress. It is unjust to argue this matter upon the theory that the people of the States are slackers; it is a question of ability.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. May I ask the Senator what determines the relative contributions of the several States and the United States under the proposal of the Senator, whether it shall be $10 or $15 or $20?

Mr. BORAH. The State determines how much it will put up. My amendment provides that whatever additional amount is necessary to make it $30, the National Government shall contribute that much.

Mr. STEIWER. In other words, the State would determine the amount of its contribution in each case, and the Federal Government would merely supplement it with the idea of making the total contribution $30?

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the amendment is not in agreement with what the Senator said he intended to offer, as I read the amendment. It reads:

An amount, which shall be used exclusively as old-age assistance, sufficient to make the Federal contribution with respect to each such individual for each month in the quarter $30.

Mr. BORAH. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. It would seem from the printed amendment which I have read that what the Senator is attempting to do is to exact from the Federal Government $30 a month.

Mr. BORAH. Not at all. The wording of the bill remains as it is. In other words, a State plan for old-age assistance must provide that it shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the State, and, if administered by them, be mandatory upon them. Second, it provides for financial participation by the State. Third, such a State plan must " either provide for the establishment or designation of a single State agency to administer the plan ", and so forth. All that language remains as it is, and I simply add that the State must put up something, the State must make its contribution, otherwise there is no provision whatever for payment to its old-age people. If the State puts up $15, then the National Government contributes $15.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator have any doubt, if his amendment should be adopted, that the States would contribute the very minimum and the whole burden would then be upon the Federal Government?

Mr. BORAH. The State would have to contribute something before it could get anything.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Idaho how much the State would have to contribute?

Mr. BORAH. The State must determine first what it shall contribute. If the State should contribute $1, the Federal Government would contribute $29. I do not recognize the principle that the State would seek to get from under its burden or its obligation. There is just as much reason to assume that the people in a State will be anxious to take care of their people as that the National Government will desire to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the difficulty about the Senator's amendment is that it provides that in case the States do not contribute substantially the Federal Government shall make contribution to the amount of $30. The Senator need not be misled about the matter. The amendment invites the States to make a minimum contribution. In my judgment, if the amendment should be adopted it would mean that the Federal Government would bear practically the entire burden of this title.

Mr. BORAH. That is on the assumption that the States have no sense of responsibility and no idea of discharging their responsibility in regard to this matter. It proceeds upon the theory that the Congress has the power——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. BORAH. I pardon the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think that conclusion is justified.

Mr. BORAH. And I think it is justified.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the language of the amendment provides that the States must contribute something, but no matter how little they contribute the Federal Government will contribute the remainder up to the amount of $30 per month. In the case of a State which is in straitened circumstances financially, under the amendment the natural result would be for the State to contribute just as little as is possible in order to secure for its citizens the benefits of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. I assume that the State will contribute whatever it can contribute. I assume that the State will be perfectly willing to discharge its responsibilities toward its old people. The States are just as likely to do it as is the Congress of the United States. If they cannot do so, if a State is unable to make its appropriation, then I say the old people should not be left without help; that they should not be left without sufficient means to take care of themselves; and $30 a month is a very small amount, in my judgment, to take care of these people. To proceed upon the theory that a State will do nothing if it is able to do it is, in my judgment, a wrong theory.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the Senator's amendment does not require the States to do all they are able to do. It leaves it absolutely optional with the State to determine the amount which it shall contribute, and therein lies the vice of the amendment. I, no more than the Senator from Idaho, wish to cast any reflection upon a State, but I know there are some States whose financial condition is such that they would naturally resort to the policy of contributing just as little as would be necessary in order to obtain the Federal contribution.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt there are States which are financially in such condition that they would not be able to meet the full $15 contribution. It is for that reason that I do not want the old people in those States to suffer simply because the State is unable to take care of the situation. I do not recognize the principle that the State will not do all it can do. The very fact that the National Government is willing to assist in the matter in case the State undertakes to do something will encourage the people of the State to undertake to do what they can do.

I have no doubt that they would do all they can do; and if they do all they can do, but are unable to put up the necessary amount, shall we leave the old people without any means whatever of being taken care of in this situation?

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays upon this question.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LONG. There are some of us who would like to vote for this amendment, particularly the Senator from Georgia and myself, who represent States which are affected by a constitutional inhibition. I wonder if the Senator would not permit us to add just a couple of words at the end of the amendment to provide that this requirement shall apply for the year 1937. In other words, some States cannot submit constitutional amendments until the fall of 1936, close to 1937, and this amendment, as I understand, requires the State to make some contribution. That will give these States a chance to be prepared. Many States, even though they should adopt a constitutional amendment, would not be able to raise the necessary revenue within this length of time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to take care of those States which are not in a position to do anything whatever, but I felt that if I undertook to do that it would undoubtedly result in the defeat of the amendment. What is it that the Senator wishes to insert?

Mr. LONG. I do not wish to have the Senator endanger his amendment at all. I desire to insert a provision that the requirement as to contribution from any State shall not be effective before the first, say, of 1937. This is the middle of 1935. The Senator is calling on a State to raise a great deal of revenue.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator would be no better off if that were done. He could not come in under the present bill.

Mr. LONG. We could, perhaps, but Georgia could not.

Mr. BORAH. My desire in this matter is to make certain that the old people shall receive at least $30 a month. I believe that each sovereign State will discharge its duty and responsibility in accordance with its financial ability to do so. There is not any more reason to suppose that a State will refuse to discharge its obligation than there is to suppose that Congress will do so. The authorities of the State feel a deep interest in their people, the same as we do. They have a humanitarian feeling the same as we have. They will take care of the condition if they can, but if they cannot, shall we leave the old people uncared for?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay action on this amendment. All Senators wish to do what they can for the needy aged; but if this amendment should be adopted it would change the whole structure of this measure. It would properly raise the question of which should have jurisdiction as between the State authorities and the Federal Government in determining who should be eligible for benefits if the Federal Government were to make twenty-nine thirtieths of the appropriations for these people, which could be done under the Senator's amendment. Certainly, if his amendment should be adopted the States could all point to financial burdens as a justification and appropriate $1 each for their needy individuals, leaving the Federal Government burdened with $29, that it would have to carry under the amendment. If some States were to give more than $1, a hue and cry would go up as to inequality among the States with reference to that matter.

We have exercised our judgment as best we could in trying to inaugurate a policy of the Federal Government cooperating with the States, each giving one-half. Is not every State in the Union in a better position under such a plan than it has been heretofore? The Federal Government heretofore has appropriated nothing for this purpose, and the States have had to take entire care of their needy aged people, except, of course, under the relief measures. We are now proposing to give them $15 per month out of the Federal Treasury. Of course it might be appealing to go back to our respective constituents and say, "I voted to give you gentlemen $30 of Federal funds instead of $15"; but we must look after some other things than merely winning votes from our constituents on this question.

We are doing more than any other Congress has attempted to do in providing $15 out of the Federal Treasury if the States put up $15. If the State puts up $10, the Federal Treasury will put up $10—an equal amount with the State. So let us not get into a controversy here and delay the passage of the bill over the question as to whether the Federal Government ought to put up four-fifths and the States one-fifth, or the Federal Government two-thirds and the States one-third, or the States $1 and the Federal Government $29. If we adopt this amendment, we shall have to undo the whole policy we have already adopted in providing for State determined and administered plans. If the funds are practically all Federal funds, we should naturally provide administration from Washington. The authorities here would direct the administration of this measure, and say who, among the people over 65 years of age, are needy and should receive these payments. In other words, the amendment would necessitate a change so that decisions would be made by a bureau here in Washington and not by the authorities in the local communities of the country. I prefer to leave the jurisdiction in the States and to let the State legislatures and the State authorities determine who is the needy individual who deserves and is entitled to this particular pension. Then if the State puts up $15 or $10, the Federal Government will match the $15 or $10.

So I hope the amendment will be voted down, because it would jeopardize the whole structure of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is it necessarily required that the State as a State shall make the contribution, or may the State, through its county commissioners, make it?

Under the laws of Florida, the State as a State would not be permitted to make the contribution, but the county commissioners could arrange to raise the money.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that it is the aggregate of what the counties put up and what the State puts up that the Federal Government will match. It is not confined to the State itself, but is broadened so as to take in communities also.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Does the Senator from Mississippi accept the construction which the Senator from Idaho places upon the amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not accept that construction of it. I know what the Senator intended; but, although I have not had time to read the amendment carefully in connection with this provision, Mr. Beaman and others of the experts tell me they construe it differently; that under the amendment the Federal Government must put up $30; and that is the way I read it. But, be that as it may, the Senator can change the provision if there is any doubt about it.

Mr. BORAH. There is not any doubt about it. There is not any occasion for changing the language. No man with a sane mind would contend that for a moment. Nothing goes to the State unless the State puts up something.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further? I desire to make an observation about that matter.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STEIWER. It occurs to me that the pending proposal made by the Senator from Idaho leaves the subdivision, numbered 1, on page 4, just exactly as it is; and that the result of the amendment would be, if enacted in the way now proposed, that the Federal Government, under subdivision numbered 1, would match the money put up by the State to the extent of the aggregate amount of $30 per month. That is to say, if the State put up $15, the Government of the United States would put up $15. If the State put up $10, the United States would put up $10. The pending amendment contains added language which provides that the United States shall provide an additional amount. I now read the amendment—

> And (2) an amount, which shall be used exclusively as old-age assistance, sufficient to make the Federal contribution with respect to each such individual for each month in the quarter $30.

Mr. President, what is it that amounts to $30? Is it the total? Of course not. I agree with the Senator from Idaho that this language is perfectly clear. I think there is no ground for misunderstanding or misconstruction. The language provides that the contribution of the Federal Government for each such month shall be $30.

Mr. HARRISON. How does the Senator get away from the plain language of the amendment, which says—

> Sufficient to make the Federal contribution with respect to each such individual for each month in the quarter $30.

Mr. STEIWER. There is no way to get away from it.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the Federal contribution.

Mr. STEIWER. That is right. If the State put up $15 under subdivision no. 1, the United States would put up $15; and then, under the pending amendment, which is marked "Subdivision No. 2" the United States would put up another $15 in order to make the Federal contribution $30; and in that case the net result would be a payment to each person of $45 per month, two-thirds of which payment would be provided by the United States.

I do not wish to vote for that proposition. I am sympathetically disposed toward the proposal made by the Senator from Idaho as he explained his proposal. It is easy for me to approve a guaranty of a minimum payment of $30 per month. If we are to enact a law on this subject the payment ought to be sufficient in amount to mean something to the recipient of the payment. An aggregate payment substantially less in amount than $30 per month is inadequate. It will not accomplish the purposes of the bill. I am wondering if, in order to have that proposition presented, some Senator would not care to revise the pending amendment in order that it may accomplish the purpose sought by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. What is the proposal which the Senator makes?

Mr. STEIWER. I have not attempted to phrase it. I merely asserted that I am sympathetic toward the idea of a minimum guaranty of $30 a month. It would seem the way to secure such guaranty is to add to the present subdivision no. 1 merely a proviso that the Federal contribution shall in any case be in such amount that the total paid shall be $30 per month.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely what I thought I was doing, and what I believe I am doing.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that the Senator change the word "Federal", in line 3, so as to make the "total contribution", instead of "Federal contribution", $30 a month.

Mr. BORAH. I am willing to consider that.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator from Idaho explain whether or not that change will require the same amount to be contributed by the Federal Government as is contributed by the State government?

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, as the amendment would read with the change, if a State government should put up $5 or $10 or $15, the Federal Government would match the amount the State contributed, and then an additional amount so as to make the total contribution $30. If the State government should put up $30, the Federal Government would not put up anything.

Mr. WALSH. By changing the word "Federal" to "total" it would mean that it would be possible for the Federal Government to have to contribute as much as $29.

Mr. BORAH. If the State put up only $1, that would be true. I am not so deeply interested in the division of sovereignty, as to who puts up the money, but I want the money contributed. If the State cannot do it—and I take it that the State will do it if it can—if the State is unable to do it, then I want the National Government to contribute, to have the old folk taken care of.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am very strongly in sympathy with the amendment of the Senator from Idaho. There are many States which, because of conditions due to drought and other circumstances, are not able to collect taxes from the taxpayers. I am satisfied that there are quite a number of States which could not meet the $15 contribution provided for in the original bill. That would mean that the old people in those States above 65 years of age would have no pensions.

It seems to me the amendment would provide a means of giving practically all the States a chance to make a small appropriation so that the old people would get $30. I have great confidence in the States putting up as much as they can, and when conditions improve, if they can put up contributions equal to those of the Federal Government, they will do so.

Furthermore, during the last few years there have been old-age pension organizations formed all over the Nation, which, as we know, have advocated much larger pensions than are suggested. True, the money is to be raised in a different way from that provided here, but that does not alter the fact that those organizations are out for larger pensions, and are advocating larger pensions, and I know they will not be satisfied with the provisions of this measure.

It seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Idaho would help greatly in assuring at least $30 for old people in States where the States can put up some money, and even if it is limited to only a few years, it would help very materially, in my opinion. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in order to make the matter beyond question, I desire to limit the contribution to $30. I do not want any loophole left. I therefore ask leave to insert, after the word "contribution" in line 3, the words "plus the State's contribution with respect to each such individual for each month, not less than $30." That would not create any obligation on the part of the National Government to put up more than the difference between what the State would contribute and $30.

Mr. HARRISON. If the State contributed a dollar the Federal Government would contribute $29, but the whole contribution could not be more than $30.

Mr. BORAH. That is quite correct.

Mr. WALSH. It simply makes more definite the point the Senator has raised.

Mr. BORAH. That is right. There need be no mistake about it, so far as I am concerned; that is what I desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, as modified.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. In his absence, not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] is detained on important public business.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] has a pair on this question with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]. The Senator from Oregon would vote "yea" and the Senator from Georgia would vote "nay" if present.

I desire also to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. NYE. Announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] as previously, I beg to announce that were he present he would vote "nay"; and if I were permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. BULKLEY. I repeat the announcement of my general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY]. Not knowing how he would vote on this amendment, I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 60, as follows:

So Mr. BORAH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 72, after line 6, it is proposed to strike out all of title XI, including all sections and paragraphs thereof on pages 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, and to the end of the first paragraph on page 80.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, title XI relates to annuity bonds.

The proposal was submitted before the House Ways and Means Committee, and was rejected. It was not incorporated in the bill which came to the Finance Committee of the Senate. At a meeting of our committee, when this proposal was considered, 12 members out of 21 were present. Seven voted in favor of the proposal and five voted against it. Three of the four Senators who voted for the proposal, according to their statements in the committee, were under the belief that insurance companies do not sell annuity bonds, especially for small sums. I read from the record of our proceedings:

Senator BARKLEY. Let me ask you this: I have a number of life-insurance policies, not very large, but I have several policies, and these insurance companies with which I have policies write me letters every few months suggesting an annuity policy that they would like for me to take. They are all above my ability to reach them. I cannot comply with their terms and take one unless it be an insignificant amount, because the amount involved in an initial payment and then the annual payment thereafter is so large that the ordinary fellow who has not a considerable income cannot get it at all. What is going to happen about that? This is just an inquiry for information. These companies, it seems to me, do not get out in that little field where many people who might have a desire for an annuity can obtain it. What are we to do about that?

Then comes my answer:

Senator LONERGAN. All of the insurance companies with which I am familiar will write any kind of an annuity policy.

Senator BARKLEY. I do not know any of that sort.

Senator LONERGAN. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Senator BARKLEY. I have the New York Life, the Union Central, the Penn Mutual, the Equitable, and none of them do.

Senator LONERGAN. We have some of the outstanding insurance companies in Hartford, Conn., where I reside, and I know that they do it.

Senator GEORGE. They write small annuities?

Senator LONERGAN. Yes.

Following the action of the Finance Committee, I contacted officials of life insurance companies to ascertain whether or not the life insurance companies of my city issue annuities in small sums. I now quote from a letter dated May 21, 1935, from the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Co., Hartford, Conn.:

As of December 31, 1934, this company had in force 3,855 single premium life annuities, representing a total annual income to the annuitants of $1,652,902.52. The average annual income to each annuitant was $428.77, which would give an average monthly income of $35.73.

This average monthly income of $35.73 indicates the fact that the bulk of our annuity business consists of annuities of moderate size. As our annuity contracts are about the same as those of other companies, we believe these figures are fairly typical.

I now quote from a letter received from the Phoenix Mutual Life Insurance Co., of Hartford, Conn., dated May 29, 1935:

Under another group of contracts on the annuity plan we provide that at a definite time in the future there will be paid an average of $455.93 in annuity income per annum, which is the equivalent of $37.99 per month. These contracts are available in units of $10 per month of annuity income, and the premium, depending upon the duration of the contract, may be as low as $20 per annum.

I quote from a report submitted to me by the Connecticut General Life Insurance Co., of Hartford, Conn.:

Title XI, United States annuity bonds, which was eliminated by the House, has been reintroduced by the Senate. In the Senate Finance Committee report, one of the reasons given for this portion of the bill is that "insurance companies do not now sell any considerable number of commercial annuities to individuals installments. People of small means are practically outside of the commercial-annuity field." This hardly justifies the issuance of annuity bonds to provide as high as $100 per month old-age income. Many insurance companies will issue policies providing old-age income as low as $10 per month, and some even lower. It seems to me that this portion of the bill should be eliminated, because the few who will purchase the annuity bonds will most likely be individuals who can be taken care of by the insurance companies.

Mr. President, not only have the life-insurance companies already written thousands of annuity policies, but they are preparing to take care of an immense potential market for annuities in a much more comprehensive way than the plan provided by title XI of this bill.

Dr. S. S. Huebner, dean of the American College of Life Underwriters, in an article in the Life Insurance Courant, pointed out, as long ago as September 1932, that America is rapidly becoming annuity-minded. He said:

> During the past decade premiums paid for annuities have increased relatively more than six times as fast as premiums paid for life insurance. Annuities are about the only important branch of the insurance business which has gained during the hectic years of 1930 and 1931. Retirement pensions are also being considered everywhere in industry, by educational institutions, governmental bodies, and the like. Moreover, insurance companies are more and more emphasizing "old-age income insurance", and wisely so, since the plan emphasizes the utilization of life-insurance proceeds for annuity income purposes during old age. Instead of preaching death only, as formerly, emphasis is now placed upon a motive to benefit the policyholder while living. The annuity field will soon be ranged adequately along the insurance field. I believe the growth of the annuity concept among the American people will be the greatest single development in the life-insurance business during the next quarter of a century.

Mr. President, I think these reports point out conclusively that private insurance companies have developed and are developing a much more stable field of annuities than the Senate has perhaps heretofore realized. Here we have a bill including a section which would put the Government into that business in such a way that it would intrude upon private business enterprise, and no doubt discourage the widespread development of annuities which is being undertaken. As has been pointed out, the companies are taking policies with returns as low as $10 per month to the holder. Title XI of this bill would provide for annuities of not less than $60 nor more than $1,200 per annum, which is clearly an intrusion on the private insurance business.

Besides demoralizing the wonderful progress of annuity insurance in private companies, this section would place an unfair burden upon the taxpayers. The Government would pay the overhead, such as rents, lights, and so forth, which private companies must figure into their costs. The taxpayers who would not be interested in the annuities would be required to carry the burdens of those who received the annuities. The benefits would go to a particular few at the expense of the many.

The Government already offers, through the Treasury and the Post Office Departments, numerous opportunities for investments of small savings in the tax-exempt field. An extension of this program to include annuity insurance bonds would definitely compete with an important business, and, moreover, would tend to invite individuals to lean upon the Government instead of private business and the various State and municipal governments which are expected to participate in this social security program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Connecticut on the amendment has expired. He has 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. LONERGAN. I will use my time on the bill.

Above all other considerations, I think we should remember, Mr. President, that the insurance companies of this Nation have been our last wall of defense in our depressing times. When our banks crumbled and finance was chaotic our insurance companies stood like the rock of Gibraltar. Everyone knows that had they crashed this Nation would have been placed in a desperate condition. Property values would have vanished and millions more of our people would have been on the charity and relief lists at the expense of the Government. The insurance companies were the last to ask for any governmental assistance. Because of their good management and sound policies, they did not need it so much as did other business enterprises. Their position during the depression, in my opinion, was the strongest single contributing factor to maintenance of financial stability and public confidence. Had they crashed, all confidence would have crashed with them.

Now, Mr. President, is the Senate of the United States going to enact into law a provision in this bill which will injure these companies? Is the Senate going to place the Government into a definitely private business? Is the United States Senate going to discourage sound development of the annuity insurance business along a much broader front than the Government could possibly undertake? Is the United States Senate going to reinsert in this measure a section which was stricken out by the House, and which never should have been there in the first place?

I ask the Senate these questions and believe that Senators will vote for my amendment, which will do no injury to this measure, and which will not harm in any way the theory or the practice of old-age pensions or unemployment insurance, for which I have worked for a great many years.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I merely desire to make a brief statement. The provision giving an opportunity to people to buy annuity bonds, with the limitation which is in the bill, that in no instance may they receive an annuity of more than $100 a month. It was placed there to take care of a group that did not come within the other provisions of the measure. I think it is one of the minor features of the bill; in other words, I think the annuities provided in title II of the bill, and the old-age pensions and the unemployment features under other titles are much more important than is this; but, for the reasons I have just stated, we placed this provision in the bill on the recommendation of the President's committee which investigated the matter.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. LONERGAN. At the time this proposal was before our committee there were 12 Senators present, were there not?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator states the fact correctly with reference to that.

Mr. LONERGAN. There are 21 members of the committee, and the vote was 7 to 5.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Chairman of the Finance Committee a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is my understanding that the annuity bond feature of the bill is designed to offer many million people an opportunity to purchase cheap annuity insurance, free from premiums to agents, and that the persons who, under the committee amendment, are offered this security are employers or employees who do not come under other provisions of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has stated the facts correctly.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The aggregate number of those who would be enabled, under these provisions, to purchase reasonable annuity insurance would apparently be something like 22,000,000 people. Does the Senator know whether that is a correct estimate?

Mr. HARRISON. That statement was made by Representative LEWIS, I think, in a very able presentation of this matter before the Finance Committee.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I say that it was on my motion that these provisions were included in the bill in the Finance Committee? The motion was made following what was, as the Chairman of the Finance Committee has just stated, a very able presentation of the reasons for the amendment by Representative DAVID J. LEWIS, of Maryland, who has been a lifelong student of this and allied questions. Representative LEWIS pointed out, as just indicated, that there are about 22,000,000 persons in the United States at this time who do not come under the protective clauses of the pending bill. Among those are the self-employed and the members of professions, who are estimated at this time to be about 11,125,000, and approximately 10,000,000 workers. The purpose of the provisions, of course, is to permit the purchase from the Government, on reasonable terms, of annuity bonds which will guarantee the purchasers incomes running from a minimum of $60 a year to $1,200 a year per person.

When Representative LEWIS presented this matter to the Senate Finance Committee he persuasively enumerated reasons which make these amendments particularly appealing to Members of the Senate, to professional men of all sorts, and to employers who are unable, for one reason or another, to guard against the likelihood that old age will find them reduced to need. He made a statement which, with the permission of the Senate, I should like to have read at the desk, because it presents the reasons, as concisely as possible, for the adoption of these amendments.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. LONERGAN. Does the Senator know whether or not the United States Government can issue insurance at a cheaper rate than can insurance companies of long experience?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is my understanding that under these amendments the Government of the United States would sell annuity bonds to investors——

Mr. LONERGAN. That is correct.

Mr. COSTIGAN. And that there would be an absence of the premiums which ordinarily go to insurance representatives.

Mr. LONERGAN. If these bonds were authorized and issued they would be exempt from taxation, would they not?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is a provision exempting the bonds from taxation, but if the Senator from Connecticut will consult the amendment he will find a provision which does not exempt the income of these bonds from taxation.

Mr. LONERGAN. The Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Connecticut have been working for some time to secure the adoption of a constitutional provision so that in the future such exemption will not be possible.

The next question I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado is——

Mr. COSTIGAN. Before the Senator from Connecticut proceeds, may I call his attention to the provision with respect to tax exemption?

Mr. LONERGAN. The Senator has stated that the proposed law provides that the income from the bonds shall be taxed.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I understand the Senator from Connecticut does not dispute the accuracy of the statement made? The part to which I refer is section 1105 of the amendment, which reads as follows:

SEC. 1105. The provisions of section 7 of the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended (relating to the exemptions from taxation both as to principal and interest of bonds issued under authority of section 1 of that act, as amended), shall apply as well to United States annuity bonds, except that annuity and redemption payments upon United States annuity bonds shall be subject to taxation by the United States, any State, and any possession of the United States, and by any local taxing authority, but to no greater extent than such payments upon other annuity bonds or agreements are taxed.

Mr. LONERGAN. Is it the purpose of the Senator from Colorado to have incorporated in the RECORD the entire statement made by Representative LEWIS?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is my understanding that the statement made to the Finance Committee by Representative LEWIS was confidential, because made in executive session.

Mr. LONERGAN. It is a matter of public record now.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Because of that fact, I asked Representative LEWIS to prepare for use of the Senate a statement summarizing his arguments in support of the amendment now being considered. That is the statement before me at this time which I have requested to have read by the clerk at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

I know a married couple who are past 60. They have saved some $15,000 in their life's efforts. If they knew just how long each of them would live they could provide their own annuity by investing the $15,000 in safe Government bonds. They could take enough out of the principal each year, in addition to the interest, to provide themselves a hundred dollars per month. But they do not know how long either of them will live, and so they are afraid to touch the principal.

Now, the Government does know how long they are going to live as members of a class, and paying them the interest as it would on the bonds the Government can take enough out of the principal each year to provide them annuity for which they fully pay.

Take again, a case of a husband who has a $15,000 estate. He wishes to provide for his wife in the event of his death. In his will he can have the estate converted into a life annuity for her benefit instead of having the estate eaten up by the court costs, trustee's fee, and commissions. If he has children he can secure their futures in the same way instead of willing them lump sums to be wasted by inexperienced hands.

Let us see about the great human interest involved. In this bill we undertake to realize certain social security objectives. With regard to wageworkers and employees up to $2,500 a year, we have covered the field approximately. But how about the immense number of people who are not employees? Take the physicians, the lawyers, the clergy; take the small business man. What may be his situation when he reaches 65 or 66? There are more than 20,000,000 involved in that situation who may be reasonably included in the social security principle of this bill.

Apparently, there is no objection to the annuity provision of this bill as far as the public is concerned or any part of the public. In fact, the insurance companies have spoken through one of their principal leaders, Mr. Thomas I. Parkinson, of the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States. He said that the social insurance provisions of the bill would, like the $10,000-insurance provision of the war act for the soldiers, operate to increase greatly and intensify the thought of the public on the subject of individual protection through insurance.

I quote, in part, from a letter on the subject written by Mr. Parkinson:

"Just as the business of life insurance received tremendous impetus from the successful efforts of the Government to provide a sizable amount of insurance on the lives of all called to the Armies in the creation and the development of the War Risk Bureau, so do I believe that social insurance agitation will result in renewed appreciation and great stimulating of life-insurance activities, both individual and group.

"Insurance men are ready to lend their experience in the service of this social insurance class by assisting in the formation of social insurance measures along lines of sanity and workability. As an insurance man, I would say without hesitation that the efforts to provide through social insurance measures a more self-respecting form of relief, a better budgeted charity program, will do much to arouse public interest in the whole subject of security. In doing this, that overwhelming number of upstanding men and women who represent the insurance field will be inspired to look more deeply into their insurance needs and to more completely provide security for themselves. Thus, it is likely, in my judgment, that history will repeat itself and the impetus given to the cause of life insurance by the War Risk Bureau in putting a value of $10,000 on the life of every enlisted man will be accentuated with the result that the present agitation for social-insurance measures will swell the volume of individual and group life insurance and annuities.

"In doing this, the insurance companies and their agents will not only be benefited by an enhanced business, but the business itself will the better be able to muster to its support public appreciation of the tremendous national and community service rendered by life insurance supplied through premium-paying Americans, who, wanting no charity, take care of themselves and those dependent on them."

There is a field of potential traffic in the small annuity, as there was in the small parcel, which requires special inducement and conditions in order to develop it.

When we took up the parcel post 24 years ago we found that the express companies were moving three parcels per capita in the United States. In Switzerland they were moving nine per capita. They had a completely developed parcel-post system, with rates and conditions of service adapted to the needs of this small parcel. It could not pay the 24-cent minimum which the express company found it necessary to charge the parcel here. It could pay 7 or 8 or 10 cents.

With our parcel-post system, the 3 parcels per capita have reached about 9 in the United States, all of which shows that two-thirds of that traffic, potential for generations, had been defeated by the absence of rate systems and conditions of service permitting it to move.

In this small annuity field you are finding analogous phenomenon. For the big lump-sum payment you would take in $15,000 at one stroke. An agent assuredly would call for that. The company will get about 4½ percent out of that. But for the small installment monthly payments that may begin as early as 30 or 35 to accumulate an annuity at 60 or 65, no agent can bother with that. The expenses of the work would utterly defeat the motive to do it, unless the great expense were added to the premiums, when the motive to buy the annuity would be defeated.

And so we find here, as with the small parcel, a neglected field the insurance company cannot serve with sufficient economy.

Then there is the very vital element in this whole situation. It is the question of faith. It is the controlling element in our conditions. Now, the Government supplies that element of faith. The private company has to face a wall of distrust and break through it. In the course of generations—and it has taken generations—it has succeeded with respect to the familiar life policies. But the annuity policy is new; that is, it is new to the masses. They need to be educated to its wisdom. The Government has no wall of distrust to meet. It can educate the public. The companies will come in for their share in the resulting confidence in the annuity, and will have a monopoly of the business in annuities above $100 a month.

Through the initial faith that the Government supplies, we can hope to provide a means which men and women who are not covered by these pension and employment provisions may, through their own savings and efforts in life, provide for themselves. Some, of course, will be satisfied with $30 a month; others may desire in proportion to their capacity to acquire such annuities for themselves. Why deny them the surest security in doing so?

The per capita income of employees in agriculture was $648 in 1929 and $352 in 1932.[2]

The per capita income of employees in domestic service was $961 in 1929 and $670 in 1932.[3]

The number of annuities in force under the Canadian voluntary annuity system was 14,400 on March 31, 1933. The maximum annuity is $1,200. The contracts pay 4-percent interest compounded annually, the interest and administrative cost being paid by the Government. The average annuity contract for the immediate annuity type was $418 on March 31, 1933. Nearly 84 percent of all annuity contracts written in 1930 were for less than $600.

In addition to Canada, Ecuador, France, Japan, and the Netherlands have voluntary annuity systems.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, using the balance of my time on the bill, I wish first to express regret that the importance of this question is not being given attention by a larger present representation of the Senate. As disclosed in the thoughtful statement of Representative LEWIS, this proposal represents a moderate plan for handling annuity protection for the benefit of approximately 20,000,000 Americans in a field in which the private insurance companies have shown little active concern.

The subject was canvassed fairly and fully before the Finance Committee. It developed, as illustrated in the statement of Mr. Parkinson, read at the desk a moment ago, the interesting conclusion that the standard insurance companies of the country are today not disposed to criticize this type of Government activity; more than that, their officials incline to believe that if the Government will deal with annuity bonds as provided in this amendment, the ultimate effect will be to popularize other forms of life insurance in this country and increase the business and net earnings of life-insurance companies.

We are not without a precedent in thus anticipating the popularization of life insurance. In or about 1907, under the leadership of no less eminent a public official than Mr. Justice Brandeis, the State of Massachusetts authorized its mutual-savings banks to receive payments in small amounts on moderate-priced insurance policies primarily for the benefit of working men and women, and from that day to this the system inaugurated in Massachusetts has been a marked success. Indeed, it is doubtful if there is any single contribution to public affairs by Mr. Justice Brandeis of which he thinks so highly as this. That law worked as the provisions in this bill may be expected to work. Instead of diminishing insurance sales by the standard companies of Massachusetts, it spread the use and advertisement of insurance to such an extent that by common consent today the standard companies are the substantial beneficiaries of the Massachusetts experiment.

I suggest, therefore, that this amendment should be seriously considered by the Senate. It should at least go to conference. In my judgment, there is no serious opposition to it on the part of the leading insurance companies of the country. The only objection comes from those who, like the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN], are reluctant to see any form of Government activity which may be regarded, even theoretically, as competitive with private business.

I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will not prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the parliamentary situation. The motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] seeks to strike out an amendment of the committee not as yet acted upon.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut, in my time, to answer a few questions about this amendment.

One question is as to the accuracy of the terminology. It seems to me it is incorrect to describe that which is really an insurance policy as a bond. I am wondering if I am correct in that feeling.

Mr. LONERGAN. Of course, it is a plan to sell bonds; but the bill provides for the sale of bonds. Bonds and policies in this sense are the same thing.

Mr. ADAMS. A bond, as a matter of legal terminology, is an instrument providing for the payment of a fixed sum of money at a fixed time.

Mr. LONERGAN. That is correct.

Mr. ADAMS. Here is an indefinite sum of money, depending upon the length of life of the annuitant.

Mr. LONERGAN. Yes, sir; and the amount paid.

Mr. ADAMS. Why did not the committee describe these instruments by a correct term, and call them annuity policies rather than bonds?

Mr. LONERGAN. The Senator from Connecticut opposed this proposal in the committee. He subsequently asked that the proposal be submitted to the full membership. Therefore, he is not in position to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. ADAMS. One other question, if I may submit it.

The amendment provides that the installments which are to be paid to the annuitant—

> Shall be such as to afford an investment yield * * * not in excess of 3 percent per annum.

An investment yield, if I understand the term, means the income upon a principal, without the consumption of the principal. The essence of an annuity contract is the consumption of both income and principal.

Mr. LONERGAN. That is correct.

Mr. ADAMS. So that under this bill the return to the annuitant is limited to not to exceed 3 percent. He may have a life prospect of 15 years, and yet be limited to a 3-percent income upon the amount he pays for the bond.

Mr. COSTIGAN rose.

Mr. LONERGAN. Will the Senator from Colorado answer the question of his colleague?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I congratulate the junior Senator from Colorado on the ingenuity of his suggestion.

Mr. ADAMS. It is a question, not a suggestion.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It has not been offered by insurance experts. In fact, it should be said to the Senate that this entire amendment has met the approval of experts. It has not encountered from any part of the Federal Goverment such objections as the Senator from Colorado has made.

Mr. ADAMS. May I suggest that I can see why the insurance company would not object, because the annuity policy pays so much less than the policy which the insurance company would offer. I should apprehend that the insurance company would object if the Government were issuing a better policy than the company.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I suggest to the able Senator from Colorado that the field with which we are now dealing is one in which the standard life-insurance companies have rarely issued policies or given the sort of assurances the Senator from Colorado is now indicating? May I also say that if there is merit in his argument, there is no reason for apprehension about these provisions, because the insurance companies can enter the field and provide those who desire old-age annuity security, under the theory of the Senator from Colorado, on much more reasonable terms than are provided in the bill. I think the Senator will find, on investigation, that what the Government would do under these provisions is to provide old-age annuity security in a field where today it cannot be purchased by citizens of this country with anything like the same assurances.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, my distinguished colleague has misinterpreted my inquiry as an argument. I am trying to get some information about a provision of a bill which comes from the committee with very inadequate explanation, which puts into a bill designed for certain purposes, insurance features; and I am merely making inquiries.

I have asked why the terminology should be used to call a policy a bond, which tends to mislead those who invest. The title opens with the declaration that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States to meet public expenditures and to retire outstanding obligations rather than an accurate statement of what is intended, if I read the section correctly; namely, to issue annuity policies to those who wish to buy them. That is, we start out in the bill with what seems to me to be really a misstatement or, rather, a failure accurately to state the purpose of the title.

Then I have inquired why the payments are limited to investment yields rather than to properly annuity yields, which consume principal as well as interest.

I am not arguing. I am merely inquiring in order that my own vote may be cast in accordance with the facts.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I have, of course, no desire to misinterpret any suggestion of the Senator from Colorado. If I am in error in assuming that the Senator has made an argument, I of course withdraw that assumption or suggestion. I may say that it impresses me as of very slight consequence what the particular phraseology of these amendments is so long as the essential end is clear. The purpose is to provide a Government promise in the form of an annuity bond, which may be described as an insurance policy, if the Senator prefers, constituting a guaranty of security for the later years of those who desire safely to invest their earnings or savings for that result.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the senior Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not this title put the Government into the insurance business?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It does in a minor way, in a very limited field, in which, according to the testimony we have had, insurance companies have not desired to go. It is a field which has not been cultivated by standard insurance companies. It has been neglected, and indeed, according to our information, many insurance men would be glad to see the Government undertake this responsibility because it would advertise the value of insurance as protection against the financial casualties of life.

Mr. McKELLAR. But it does put the Government into the insurance business. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me to make an observation?

Mr. ADAMS. I am very glad to yield the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. During the war we went into the insurance business for our soldiers, but since the war we have found it to be very impracticable for the Government to continue that activity, and we are getting out of it as rapidly as possible. With that experience in mind, it seems to me to be most unwise for us now to go into the insurance business even in a limited way, and my purpose is to vote in favor of the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to ask a question which is very unwelcome these days. In what clause of the Federal Constitution does the Senator find justification for the issuance of a Federal insurance policy?

Mr. McKELLAR. I know of no such clause in the Constitution. I know there has been an opinion by Judge Grubb, in Alabama, which is now on appeal, in which he held that the Government could not go into business. I do not know whether the opinion is correct or not; I have doubts about its correctness. However that may be, there is no clause of the Constitution under which this title can be defended. It is true that under the express war power that is given us in the Constitution we had a right to insure our soldiers, but as I look at it we have not a scintilla of right to put the Government into the insurance business as is proposed, and I stop long enough to ask what clause of the Constitution gives us the right?

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask the able Senator from Tennessee on what clause of the Constitution he predicates the ability of the Federal Government to create the Tennessee Valley Authority?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is upon that clause of the Constitution which deals with interstate commerce. It is that provision of the Constitution which gives the Government authority over navigable streams, an entirely different situation from the present one. Even supposing we had no right to create the T. V. A., that would be no reason why we should pass another unconstitutional measure, and I for one am not willing to vote for a bill which I feel is unconstitutional.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The able Senator from Tennessee finds no intrastate activities in the Tennessee Valley Authority?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course there are intrastate activities, but there are interstate activities also; and it is operating on a navigable stream which runs into several States, a very different situation from the one we are now considering.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is gratifying to realize that the Senator agrees with those of us who find no constitutional difficulty affecting the Tennessee Valley Authority and other large issues which are to come before the Supreme Court. I wish only to say that what is attempted——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire recognition, and I will yield to the Senator to ask me a question.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I appreciate the courtesy of the able Senator from Kentucky. What I want to say further is this—and to state it as a question, I trust the able Senator from Kentucky will agree with me—that the amendment provides for the issuance of bonds in exchange for money. The Senator from Tennessee undoubtedly does not deny the authority of the United States to sell its bonds for money or to issue agreements in writing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course not.

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is sufficient authority for this proposal in that power.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think it has anything to do with the beginning and operation of an insurance company in competition with private companies.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee a while ago referred to the provisions made by the Government for insuring the soldiers. The Constitution gives the Congress the right to declare war, and that is all it says about that subject. We have used the war power, assuming it covered everything we wanted to do following a declaration of war; but I challenge the Senator from Tennessee or any other Senator to find anything in the Constitution which specifically authorizes the issuance of a life-insurance policy on a soldier. There is no such authority in the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether or not the question of the insurance policies issued on the lives of our soldiers has been before the Supreme Court; I do not believe it has; but under the broad power of self-defense, in what is generally spoken of by those who quote the Constitution as the "war power", there is some semblance of excuse for the issuance of policies on the lives of soldiers when we are exposing them to the hazards of war. But there is no possible way in which the Constitution could be construed to cover putting the United States Government into the life-insurance business.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, it is useless for any Senator to argue with another Senator upon the Constitution, because each Senator knows more about that than all the other 94 Senators.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no doubt as to the unconstitutionality of the pending proposal, and I expect to vote against it.

Mr. BARKLEY. We talk about war powers which we assume exist, and no doubt they do, but they exist largely because there is another provision in the Constitution giving Congress all power necessary to carry into effect the powers specifically conferred upon it, so that we do act on things which are not mentioned in the Constitution, and we have to do it. But in this particular situation we provide for the issue of a bond by the Secretary of the Treasury. If I have $2,000 which I desire to invest I cannot go to an ordinary life-insurance company and get an annuity; they are not interested in small matters of that sort. They are not concerned about an annuity which involves so small an investment, because it is more trouble than it is worth.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think the Senator is wholly mistaken in making that observation, because on hundreds of occasions I have been urged by representatives of insurance companies to buy an annuity policy.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have, too, but I never had any of them ask me to buy any policy of less than $10,000.

Mr. ADAMS. That was a personal compliment.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I read from a communication written by a standard life-insurance company which issues a strictly annuity policy for as low as $10 a month. I quoted from our proceedings in the Senate Committee on Finance, and among other things I remember the query of the Senator along the same line. I think the Senator from Kentucky and a few other Senators joined the majority in voting for this proposal in the belief that the life-insurance companies do not issue small annuity policies. In that respect those who so voted were in error.

Mr. BARKLEY. It may be that I was in error, but so far as the committee had any information on the subject, we were not. However, I am not making any question about it.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I have made inquiry in reference to the Constitution, and I wanted to suggest to the Senator from Connecticut as to the foundation upon which the inquiry was made. I was relying upon a fair inference from the action of my learned colleague, a good lawyer, who offered an amendment to the Constitution, and I assume he would not have asked to have the Constitution amended if he had thought it was adequate to meet these conditions. That was the basis of my inquiry.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know what the suggestion of the Senator's colleague is.

Mr. ADAMS. A broad, sweeping amendment to the Constitution which would provide unquestionably the authority for the Government to take the proposed action.

Mr. BARKLEY. It did not have any reference to insurance, did it?

Mr. ADAMS. I think it would include insurance.

Mr. BARKLEY. That would depend on how broad it is. I do not know how broad it is. I do not think it was specifically intended to refer to a situation such as this. It may be that it is a sort of an omnium gatherum, which contemplates an amendment to the Constitution giving us power to do everything we have not power to do now under the Constitution; but that would be a different thing; and I do not understand that to be the amendment offered by the Senator's colleague. Undoubtedly we have the power to issue bonds, and we have the power to use the credit of the United States. If I have $2,000 to invest in such a bond, the terms of which are that I will be paid back in monthly or annual installments the money I put in, there is certainly nothing unconstitutional about that. It is merely a different way by which the United States would repay its debts or the money that it borrowed from the people, just as in the case of Liberty bonds. The Government could pay them back all at once, or, if it desired to do so, it could authorize repayment in installments. That is all this provision undertakes to do. When we come down to brass tacks, that is all it amounts to. I place a certain amount of money in a Government bond, and we provide for paying it back in annual installments, which is simply a method by which the Government repays its debt.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. In answer to the Senator's previous question, I read from the Constitution, as follows:

SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power * * * to * * * provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

And again—

To raise and support armies.

And again—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers—

And so forth.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; all "the foregoing powers."

Mr. McKELLAR. That is ample provision, in my judgment. I now ask the Senator to put his finger on any clause or phrase of the Constitution which allows the United States Government to enter the insurance business generally.

Mr. BARKLEY. I shall quote, not in exact language, but the substance of the constitutional provision, that Congress shall have the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States; and that is what this amounts to. It is borrowing from the people who desire to buy these bonds money which is to be returned to them in annual payments in the form of an annuity. The Senator can call it an "insurance policy" if he wishes to. If I have $10,000 which I invest in a Liberty bond, that is an insurance policy to some extent. If I invest $10,000 in a bond of the United States, that money will be paid back to me according to the terms of the bond, and that is an insurance that I will get my $10,000 whenever the Government pays it. The pending measure provides that if I put in $10,000 or any other amount provided in the bill instead of paying it all back to me at once, the Government shall pay it back in annual installments which we call an annuity. I do not see any difference, so far as the principle is concerned, between one and the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understood the Chair to say that the question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] to strike out the amendment of the Senate committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The situation, as the Chair understands it, is this: The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] would strike out an amendment of the committee not as yet acted upon. Therefore, when the Chair puts the question he will put the question upon the committee amendment; and if a Senator wishes to accomplish the purpose of the Senator from Connecticut he will vote "nay." If he wishes to vote for the committee amendment, he will vote "yea."

Mr. BARKLEY. That is what I was coming to. I thought the Presiding Officer was about to put the question on a motion to strike out a committee amendment which had been acted on. The vote is on the committee amendment. Those who favor the committee amendment will vote "yea", and those who are opposed to the committee amendment will vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those who wish to accomplish the purpose of the Senator from Connecticut will vote "nay."

Mr. LONERGAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

Mr. LONERGAN. The pending motion is to strike out title XI.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the question will be submitted as to the adoption of the committee amendment, beginning on page 72, line 7, being title XI. Those desiring to support the committee amendment will vote "yea." Those favoring the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON. Those in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, on page 72, beginning with line 7, being title XI.

The amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 24, before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That in order to assist the aged of the several States who have no State system of old-age pensions until an opportunity is afforded the several States to provide for a State plan, including financial participation by the States, and notwithstanding any other provision of this title, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to each State for each quarter until not later than July 1, 1937, to be used exclusively as old-age assistance, in lieu of the amount payable under the provisions of clause (1) of this subsection, an amount sufficient to afford old-age assistance to each needy individual within the State who at the time of such expenditure is 65 years of age or older, and who is declared by such agency as may be designated by the Social Security Board, to be entitled to receive the same: Provided further, That no person who is an inmate of a public institution shall receive such old-age assistance, nor shall any individual receive an amount in excess of $15 per month.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I have talked to the Senator from Georgia about the subject matter of this amendment and have had numerous conferences in regard to it. What the Senator seeks to do by his amendment is to enable States which have no pension-system set-up, and which, therefore, would be unable to take advantage the first year, 1936, of the appropriations by Federal Government for assistance to States or States such as the Senator's State, Georgia, where the State constitution prohibits pension plans being created, making necessary an amendment to the State constitution, to avail themselves of the Federal assistance until such States may have time to adopt a State plan.

Mr. RUSSELL. For a period of only 2 years, until an opportunity can be afforded all the States to establish a State system.

Mr. HARRISON. And pending such time some agency is to be appointed by the Social Security Board which may reach the needy individuals who would come under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Mississippi is correct. This problem in the States that have no old-age-pension system has been greatly accentuated within the past 3 or 4 weeks by the policy of the Relief Administration in inaugurating the work-relief program in turning back to the States and local communities that have no means whatever of providing for them, old people who are not capable of being employed on the work-relief program.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I may state that, so far as one member of the committee is concerned, I shall not interpose an objection to the amendment going to conference, because I believe that the States should have an opportunity of providing pension systems for themselves.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield first to the Senator from Idaho as he rose first. Then I will yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask how many States are in the situation which the Senator describes?

Mr. RUSSELL. There are, as I understand, at the present time 15 States which have no old-age-pension systems and 33 that have such systems, the systems varying, of course; they are not uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand correctly that this amendment provides that for those 15 States the Federal Government will put up $15 for people who have reached the age of 65 and over until such States shall have adopted pension systems?

Mr. RUSSELL. Not necessarily; only for a period of 2 years; the provision suggested will expire by operation of law at the end of a 2-year period.

I may say to the Senator from Idaho that the amendment does not compel the Social Security Board to pay these individuals $15; it may pay them amounts not exceeding $15. I assume that in some States the Social Security Board might not pay the entire amount of $15; but it is limited to $15, that being the maximum which will be paid from the Federal Treasury to individuals in States that today have no old-age-pension system.

Mr. BORAH. Then, I think I understand the amendment correctly. It provides that in such States as have no provision for old-age pensions for the next 2 years the Federal Government is to contribute $15?

Mr. RUSSELL. Or such amount, not exceeding $15, as the Social Security Board may fix in such States.

Mr. BORAH. It is pretty certain that it will be $15.

Mr. RUSSELL. I hope and trust it is. I certainly hope that it will not be any less than that amount.

Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], I will not make any extended remarks on this amendment. It occurs to me that the proposal is not only just and fair but that it would be unfair to aged and needy individuals in the States which today have no old-age-pension system to say that the Federal Government will not extend its hand to assist them in the slightest degree. Not only that, but they will not be permitted to share in this fund which will be paid by the taxpayers of every State at a time when they are being taken off the relief rolls and being turned back to the counties and municipalities which are already largely involved and are absolutely unable to assist such individuals.

We know the present desperate condition of many of these old people, who have seen their savings swept away either by the depreciation in securities or in other investments. They, perhaps, had farms which were under lien and have seen the lien foreclosed on account of the low price of farm commodities and the depreciation in the value of farms. As I see it, it would be nothing less than wanton cruelty to an old person in a State that has no old-age-pension system to say, "Commencing with the passage of this bill, $15 a month for such persons will be sent to a State that has an old-age-pension system, but you shall not be permitted a dime, and in addition, you, without any resources whatever, will be taken off the relief rolls."

I would not favor as a permanent policy the Federal Government paying $15, whether the State matched it or not, but States which now have no old-age-pension systems should at least be afforded an opportunity to adopt within the 2-year period a system designed to take care of their aged and those in need. Efforts to establish such systems are now being made all over the Union. In two or three instances constitutional amendments will be submitted to the people of the States within the next several months, or in the general election of 1936, which will enable the adoption of old-age-pension systems. Some States, such as the one I have the honor in part to represent in this body, have constitutional provisions which make it impossible for them to contribute a single dime to an old-age pension system, and under the peculiar provisions of our constitution an amendment cannot be submitted to the people until the next general election, which will be in 1936. So, regardless of how strongly all the people of my State and of other States similarly situated might favor an old-age pension system, they would be powerless to do anything on earth to match the Federal contribution until after the general election in November 1936. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Is there no law in the State of Georgia which permits the counties or other political subdivisions to make provision for the indigent?

Mr. RUSSELL. There is; there is a law that permits counties to have poor farms, but if the Senator from Utah were familiar with the conditions obtaining on some of the poor farms or pauper farms of this Nation, he would never by any act or word of his suggest for one moment that any aged person over 65 years should be sent to such a farm.

Mr. KING. I am not talking about that. What I am trying to ascertain is whether the Senator's State, Georgia, is powerless to give to its indigent an amount which would be equivalent to that which under the bill is to be provided by the Federal Government.

Mr. RUSSELL. The State of Georgia is absolutely powerless. The purposes for which taxes may be levied in the State of Georgia are set forth in detail in the constitution of that State. If the Senator from Utah desires, I will read him that provision of our constitution.

Mr. KING. I do not ask the Senator to do that.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is impossible for one cent in taxes to be levied and collected in the State of Georgia under our constitution as it stands today for the purpose contemplated by this bill. In order to do that an amendment to the State constitution is absolutely necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 49, line 22, after the word "deposited", it is proposed to insert the following:

Together with a statement of the additional expenditures in the District of Columbia and elsewhere incurred by the Post Office Department in performing the duties herein imposed upon said Department, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to advance from time to time to the credit of the Post Office Department from appropriations made for the collection and payment of taxes provided under section 707 of this title, such sums as may be required for such additional expenditures incurred by the Post Office Department in the performance of the duties and functions required of the Postal Service by this act.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. This is the amendment, is it not, which was suggested by the Post Office Department with reference to bearing the expenses which may be incurred by the Department under the terms of the pending bill?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the amendment covers the suggestion made to the committee by the Post Office Department. The bill makes it the duty of the Department to collect the taxes for which provision is made, but does not provide any method of meeting the additional expense to which the Department will necessarily be put. In other words, it adds another nonpostal function to the Post Office Department. Last year such nonpostal functions cost the Department more than $66,000,000.

The amendment provides that the Post Office Department shall report to the Treasury what services are required to perform the duties imposed by the bill and directs the Treasury to advance credit to the Department to meet the additional expenditures. Similar provisions are in the duck stamp law and in the baby bond law.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall not object to the amendment going to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment proposing an additional section to the bill. In my judgment, this amendment has been made necessary by the adoption of the so-called "Clark amendment." I shall send the amendment to the desk and request that it be read; and after it shall have been read, if there shall be any desire that it be explained or the necessity for the amendment made plain, I will be glad to explain it to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 52, after line 7, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 812. (a) It shall be unlawful for any employer to make with any insurance company, annuity organization, or trustee any contract with respect to carrying out a private annuity plan approved by the Board under section 702 if any director, officer, employee, or shareholder of the employer is at the same time a director, officer, employee, or shareholder of the insurance company, annuity organization, or trustee.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any person, whether employer or insurance company, annuity organization, or trustee, to knowingly offer, grant, or give, or solicit, accept, or receive, any rebate against the charges payable under any contract carrying out a private annuity plan approved by the Board under section 702.

(c) Every insurance company, annuity organization, or trustee who makes any contract with any employer for carrying out a private annuity plan of such employer which has been approved by the Board under section 702 shall make, keep, and preserve for such periods such accounts, correspondence, memoranda, papers, books, and other records with respect to such contract and the financial transactions of such company, organization, or trustee as the Board may deem necessary to insure the proper carrying out of such contract and to prevent fraud and collusion. All such accounts, correspondence, memoranda, papers, books, and other records shall be subject at any time, and from time to time, to such reasonable periodic, special, and other examinations by the Board as the Board may prescribe.

(d) Any person violating any provision of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I think I can explain very briefly the object and purpose of this amendment and the necessity for its adoption.

The amendment which was offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and adopted by the Senate would authorize the making of contracts of insurance or annuity with private insurance companies, annuity organizations, or trustees. One of the objections a great many of us had to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri was that we believed there would be a constant, continuous, and recurring incentive to companies buying such insurance to have on their list of employees the best risks it was possible to obtain. In other words, it is easy to see, if one company could obtain insurance on its employees all at the rate that would be accorded to young men from 20 to 30 while other companies retained in their employ employees from 20 to 60, that the company which had the employees from 20 to 60 would be compelled to pay a higher rate, and the result would be that such company would be at a distinct disadvantage in competing with the company which employed men of a lower age.

The Senator from Missouri believed and stated that he had avoided any danger on that score by reason of certain additions which he has made to his amendment since the time it was offered in the Finance Committee. I am perfectly willing to concede that the amendment offered on the floor by the Senator from Missouri was a distinct improvement in that regard over the amendment offered by him before the Finance Committee; but the amendment of the Senator from Missouri does not provide any method, so far as I can see, to protect in the respects in which my amendment provides.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I have had an opportunity now to examine the Senator's amendment and will state that, so far as I am concerned, I am heartily in sympathy with it.

Mr. BLACK. I was sure the Senator would be when he understood the amendment.

I can state in very few words what I have in mind. We have had a good deal of information about the way holding companies pipe profits out of operating companies. If an insurance company can be so associated with an industrial company that the insurance company can pipe the profits from the industrial company through the insurance company by this means, it would obtain exactly the same results, or certain individuals would, as though originally the company insuring the men had made the profits.

My amendment would make the books of the insurance company subject to inspection of the Government and would prevent any such unfair methods. One portion of the amendment would prevent rebates being made by an insurance company to an industrial company where the men work, and another provision would prevent interlocking directorates and interlocking stockholders. In that way it appears to me the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is greatly strengthened to accomplish the exact purpose for which he offered it on the floor of the Senate. Since he has no objection, and I have shown my amendment to the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and it meets with his approval, unless there is some further question I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if there are no further amendments to be offered to title II and title VIII of the bill, I wish to offer at this time a substitute for title II and title VIII; that is, the Federal old-age benefit provisions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read the amendment in the nature of a substitute, as follows:

TITLE I—INDUSTRIAL PROTECTION

SECTION 1. (a) When used in this title, unless the context otherwise indicates—

(1) The term "person" means individual, association, partnership, or corporation.

(2) The term "employer" means any person in the United States who at any one time during the taxable year employs 50 or more employees, and any group of persons in the United States engaged in the same field of industry which group at any one time during the taxable year employs 50 or more employees and which is formed voluntarily for the purpose of being considered an employer within the meaning of this act, but does not include the United States Government, or any State or political subdivision or municipality thereof, or any person subject to the Railroad Retirement Act.

(3) The term "employee" means any person in the service of an employer the major portion of whose duties are performed within the United States.

(4) The term "United States", when used in a geographical sense, means the several States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii.

(5) The term "pay roll" means all wages paid by an employer to employees.

(6) The term "wages" means every form of remuneration for services received by an employee from his employer, whether paid directly or indirectly by the employer, including salaries, commissions, bonuses, and the reasonable money value of board, rent, housing, lodging, payments in kind, and similar advantages.

(b) For the purposes of this title the wages of any employee receiving wages of more than $7,200 per annum shall be considered to be $7,200 per annum.

SEC. 2. There shall be levied, assessed, and collected annually from each employer in the United States for each taxable year an excise tax equal to 5 percent of such employer's pay roll during that part of such taxable year in which he employs 50 or more employees and in which his employees were not covered by an industrial protection plan adopted with the approval of the Social Security Board as hereinafter provided, and announced to his employees.

SEC. 3. (a) The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe and publish necessary rules and regulations for the collection of the tax imposed by this title.

(b) Every employer liable for tax under this title shall make a return under oath within 1 month after the close of the year with respect to which such tax is imposed to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which is located his principal place of business. Such return shall contain such information and be made in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury may by regulations prescribe. The tax shall, without assessment by the Commissioner or notice from the collector, be due and payable to the collector within 1 month after the close of the year with respect to which the tax is imposed. If the tax is not paid when due, there shall be added as part of the tax interest at the rate of 1 percent a month from the time when the tax became due until paid. All provisions of law (including penalties) applicable in respect of the taxes imposed by section 600 of the Revenue Act of 1926 shall, insofar as not inconsistent with this act, be applicable in respect of the tax imposed by this act. The Commissioner may extend the time for filing the return of the tax imposed by this act, under such rules and regulations as he may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, prescribe, but no such extension shall be for more than 60 days.

(c) Returns required to be filed for the purpose of the tax imposed by this act shall be open to inspection in the same manner, to the same extent, and subject to the same provisions of law as returns made under title II of the Revenue Act of 1926.

(d) The taxpayer may elect to pay the tax in four equal installments, in which case the first installment shall be paid on the date prescribed for the filing of returns, the second installment shall be paid on or before the last day of the third month, the third installment on or before the last day of the sixth month, and the fourth installment on or before the last day of the ninth month after such date. If any installment is not paid on or before the date fixed for its payment, the whole amount of the tax unpaid shall be paid upon notice and demand from the collector.

(e) At the request of the taxpayer, the time for payment of any initial installment of the amount determined as the tax by the taxpayer may be extended, under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for a period not to exceed 6 months from the date prescribed for the payment of such installment. In such case the amount in respect of which the extension is granted shall be paid (with interest at the rate of one-half of 1 percent per month) on or before the date of the expiration of the period of the extension.

SEC. 4. (a) There is hereby established a Social Security Board (hereinafter referred to as the "Board") to be composed of five members, one of whom shall be designated as chairman, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than three of such members shall be of the same political party, and in making appointments members of different political parties shall be appointed alternately as nearly as may be practicable. No member of the Board shall engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. The chairman shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum and each of the other members of the Board shall receive a salary at the rate of $7,500 per annum. Each member shall hold office for a term of 5 years, except that (1) any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term, and (2) the terms of the members first taking office shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of nomination, one at the end of 1 year, one at the end of 2 years, one at the end of 3 years, one at the end of 4 years, and one at the end of 5 years from the date of enactment of this act. It shall be the duty of the Board to carry out the provisions of this act and to make an annual report to the President concerning its activities.

(b) The Board is authorized to appoint, subject to the civil-service laws, such officers and employees as are necessary for the execution of its functions under this act and to fix their salaries in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. The Board is further authorized to make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government and elsewhere, for law books, books of reference and periodicals, and for printing and binding) as may be necessary for the execution of its functions.

SEC. 5. At the close of each taxable year for which a tax is imposed by this title, the Board shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of exemption from such tax, the name of each employer whose employees have been covered during such year by an industrial protection plan approved by the Board, together with the portion of such year that the employees were so covered.

SEC. 6. Subject to the limitations of this title, the Board shall adopt and make public standards for industrial protection plans and such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry out the provisions and purposes of this title. Any employer may submit to the Board an industrial protection plan, and the Board shall approve such plan if it complies with the standard fixed by the Board. If at any time the Board finds that a plan which it has approved does not in operation comply with the standards fixed for such plans, it may withdraw its approval and shall immediately notify the employer concerned of such action. It shall be the policy of the Board to allow each such employer as much freedom in determining his plan as is consistent with the purposes of this act and the adequate protection of the fund from which benefit payments are to be made.

SEC. 7. The standards adopted by the Board shall provide—

(a) That a plan to be approved shall provide (1) that the employer will pay annually into a reserve fund deposited with some trustee or other depositary acceptable to the Board, to be used for the payment of benefits under such plan, an amount not less than the amount of earnings distributed by such employer as dividends or profits, or otherwise, during the same year until the reserve fund is on an actuarially sound basis, and (2) that thereafter the employer shall make such payments when necessary to maintain the fund on an actuarially sound basis.

(b) That the payment of benefits under an approved plan shall begin not more than a year after the beginning of its operation; that every employee who has been in the service of the employer for 1 year or more shall be eligible for benefit payments; and that the following minimum schedule of benefit payments shall be paid at the expense of the employer under the plan in full operation:

(1) In the event of the death of an employee, there shall be paid to his dependents or estate an amount equal to 6 months' wages at the rate he was receiving at the time of his death.

(2) In the event of the disability of an employee, compensation shall be paid in monthly installments to such employee while his disability lasts, or until he reaches the age of 65, at the rate of one-eighth the wages he was receiving at the time the disability was incurred.

(3) When an employee reaches the age of 65 he shall receive annually for life an annuity equal to 1 percent of his total wages during his period of employment, payable in monthly installments.

(4) In the event that an employee becomes unemployed and cannot find other employment by complying with regulations prescribed by the Board he shall be paid compensation for 1 year at the rate of one-fourth his average annual wage for the preceding 5 years, payable monthly.

(5) If the period necessary for establishing on an actuarially sound basis the fund from which benefits are to be paid has not elapsed, benefit payments may, subject to the approval of the Board, be proportionately reduced or continued for a proportionately shorter period.

(c) That an approved plan shall provide that employees may, at their election, make contributions to the fund from their wages (such contributions to be deducted from the employees' wages and paid into the fund by the employer, if the employee so requests); that the benefit payments will be increased proportionately by such employee contributions; that the employer will conduct an educational program designed to demonstrate to his employees the advantages of such contributions; and that the employees contributing shall have a right to participate in the management of the plan.

(d) That an approved plan shall provide that an employer must pay the schedule of benefits specified in this act as his part of the protection plan irrespective of any contribution which an employee may or may not make toward securing a similar schedule of benefits for himself.

(e) That an approved plan shall provide for the exchange or transfer of credits and funds upon the separation of an employee from the service of any employer, in a manner that will fully protect the interest of the employee.

(f) That employers may operate their own plans and manage their own funds on a trustee basis; that employers may have their plans wholly or partly underwritten by insurance companies; that employers may unite to pool their risks and pool their funds; and that participation in a plan under the laws of a State may be considered the operation of an approved plan, if the State plan complies with the requirements for an approved plan, including payment of the minimum schedule of benefits, specified in this act.

SEC. 8. An employer who is financially unable to provide the reserve necessary to cover the pension liability arising out of the past years of service of active employees, previous to their retirement age, may make application to the Secretary of the Treasury for a loan up to the amount of such liability. The Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, is authorized and directed to make such loans in the form of negotiable bonds to be known as "social security bonds" and which shall bear interest at the rate of 4 percent per annum. Such loans shall bear interest at a rate not in excess of 4½ percent per annum, and shall be amortized over a period not in excess of 30 years from the date of the loan. The money accruing from the difference between the interest paid on such bonds and the interest received on such loans shall be held in the Treasury as a contingency reserve to protect the United States against loss through the failure to repay any such loan. At the end of each 5-year period after the date of enactment of this act, so much of the unused surplus in such contingency reserve as, in the opinion of the Board, can be distributed without endangering the solvency of such reserve shall be distributed to the persons making payment on such loans in the proportion which the payments of each bear to the total amount of such payments during such 5-year period.

SEC. 9. Deposits in the fund from which benefits are to be paid under an industrial protection plan approved by the Board may be deducted from the gross income of an employer for the purpose of computing income taxes to be paid by him to the United States.

SEC. 10. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually for the administration of this act the sum of $1,250,000. From such appropriation the Board is authorized and directed to pay to each State maintaining a cooperative State office for the administration of this act, and furnishing an equal sum, the sum of $12,500 to be used in the administration of such plan; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to the Treasurer of such State the money so allotted.

SEC. 11. Sections 2 and 3 of this act shall become effective when the Congress by appropriate resolution shall so provide.

TITLE II—HOMESTEAD VILLAGES

SECTION 201. For the purpose of providing a means of livelihood for citizens who cannot secure employment in industry or agriculture at a living wage, the Social Security Board is authorized and directed to provide for the construction of self-supporting homestead villages in which such citizens may earn a livelihood or supplement their income from other sources.

SEC. 202. (a) The Board shall make loans for the construction of homestead villages by any agency it approves for such purpose, taking as security for such loans first mortgages on the property in respect of which the loans are made. Such loans may be made up to the full amount necessary to acquire and construct the property covered by such mortgages, shall bear interest at a rate not in excess of 5 percent per annum, and shall be amortized over a period not in excess of 30 years from the date of the loan.

(b) The Board may construct homestead villages under its own supervision and sell the homes or farms in such villages, and shall amortize the unpaid portion of the purchase price over a period not in excess of 30 years, charging interest on unpaid portions of the purchase price at a rate not in excess of 5 percent per annum.

SEC. 203 (a) The Division of Subsistence Homesteads in the Department of the Interior and all functions of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration with respect to subsistence homestead projects are hereby transferred to the Social Security Board, together with all powers and duties relating to each.

(b) All official records and papers now on file in and pertaining exclusively to the business of, and all furniture, office equipment, and other property now in use in, said Division of Subsistence Homesteads or any part, division, or section of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration or of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration whose principal duties relate to subsistence homestead projects, are hereby transferred to said Board.

(c) All officers and employees engaged primarily in carrying out functions transferred to the Board under this act are transferred to the Board without change in classification or compensation; except that the Board may provide for the adjustment of such classification or compensation to conform to the duties to which such officers and employees may be assigned.

(d) All appropriations made or allocated for the purpose of carrying out any of the functions transferred under this act shall be available for the use of the Board in constructing or making loans for homestead villages or in the completion of projects transferred under this act.

(e) All property held in the exercise of functions transferred under this act shall be transferred to the Social Security Board.

SEC. 204. There is hereby created a revolving fund of $1,000,000,000, which shall be used by the Board for the acquisition and construction of, or the making of loans on homestead villages under this act. The funds transferred under this act shall constitute a part of such fund; the President is authorized to allocate any unused funds at his disposal to such revolving fund; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for such revolving fund such sums as may be necessary to increase it to $1,000,000,000.

SEC. 205. The Board is authorized to prescribe rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this title, including rules and regulations concerning the organization and management of homestead villages, not inconsistent with the purposes of this act.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to make it clear that I am not opposed to the principles or the provisions of title I of the bill providing for grants to the States for old-age assistance or what we know as the general old-age pension provisions of the bill, nor to title III, grants to the States for unemployment compensation administration; nor to title IV, grants to the States for aid to dependent children; nor to title V, grants to States for maternal and child welfare; nor to title VI, public-health work; nor to title VII, Social Security Board, because we recognize there must be a board created to administer the several titles of the bill; nor to titles IX and X, providing grants to the States for aid to the blind. Title XII, which deals with annuity bonds, I believe, has already been rejected. Nor am I opposed to title XII, the general provisions of the bill.

In other words, with the exception of title II and the supporting tax title, title VIII, I am in full sympathy with the bill.

I am also in full sympathy with the purposes of general old-age benefits sought to be covered by the provisions of title II of the bill. I think it would have been much wiser if the bill had provided for grants in aid to the States to enable them to set up old-age benefits and benefits to cover hazards in industry just as was done under title I in making grants in aid to the States for the purpose of providing old-age assistance.

Also, Mr. President, I have believed from the first, and in the committee supported a motion to the effect that we should separate the bill into its legitimate and component parts. It is obviously unfair to ask one to vote for a bill when there is a particular title in the bill to which he does not agree at all, although having full sympathy with the general objective sought to be accomplished by those who drafted and sponsored the bill. On the contrary, it is obviously unfair to join with objectionable and essentially different legislative proposals other highly desirable proposals for which many Senators would certainly desire to vote. Every Senator no doubt would like to vote for the grant in aid to the States for old-age assistance, for aid to dependent children, for public health work, for aid to the States for the purpose of assisting and caring for the blind.

Mr. President, in this connection I desire to say that, as originally drawn, the substitute which I have offered carried certain provisions imposing a tax, but, on mature deliberation and after exhaustive study, I reached the conclusion that the taxing provisions as they now appear in the bill itself could not be sustained against attack, and therefore the substitute which I now offer as now modified provides for the imposition of a tax, but only when authorized by the Congress by an appropriate resolution.

My substitute as now presented is a substitute for title II and title VIII of the bill reported by the committee. My substitute provides against industrial hazards which are not covered in the bill before the Senate. My substitute grants greater and larger benefits. It does not undertake to cover all employees, but it does undertake to cover employees of a common employer numbering 50 or more, and also provides for separate groups in kindred industries when such groups taken together bring the total to 50 or more.

Since my substitute will appear in the RECORD in connection with my remarks, I do not propose to read its provisions or discuss them more in detail at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is the Senator's amendment simply a substitute for titles II and VIII, leaving the remainder of the bill as the Senate has agreed to it?

Mr. GEORGE. Entirely as the Senate has agreed to it.

Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement regarding the substitute.

The basic features of the substitute, which are offered in the hope, at least, that they are improvements to replace corresponding parts of the pending bill, are, in brief, as follows:

It makes possible and necessary one standard schedule of benefits to be provided by industries throughout the Nation, thus insuring the desired result and putting all industries on a fair basis of competition, as is sought, it is claimed by the proponents of the Federal old-age benefits provision, or title II of the pending bill.

It preserves a real and needed degree of freedom to industries and to the States as cooperators in the administration of the act.

It permits individual industries or groups of industries to construct and operate their own plans, requiring only that they are actuarially sound and sufficient to yield the stipulated benefits.

It permits employers and employees to receive the benefit of any saving they can effect by a wise and efficient management of their own plans.

It requires each industry to pay only the exact cost of its protection program, no more and no less, instead of a flat pay-roll tax which does not represent the cost.

It eliminates the need for a large army of Federal office-holders required by the pending act to administer it and thus saves an excessively large and needless expense.

It does not put on industries immediately a large financial burden which in a time of business depression may be a serious obstacle to recovery, but relates the expense to the process of recovery.

It makes possible the payment of retirement annuities immediately instead of postponing them for a number of years and does so without putting an undue burden on industries and without increasing the public debt or the tax rate.

It makes possible the easy amendment of the act to enlarge its provisions for the scope of its application as experience may require.

It enlarges the protection program to include death and disability hazards, as well as old-age and unemployment hazards, as provided in title II of the bill as it now stands, all four of which are vitally related and constitute essential parts of one program of unemployment.

It requires all four programs to be put on a reserve basis actuarially calculated to be sufficient, so that automatically they are financially sound, instead of imposing on pay rolls a flat rate which is only guessed or estimated to be sufficient.

It provides for the transfer of pension credits from one employment to another, so that each employer bears the expense only for the number of years an employee spent in his services, and an employee does not lose his reward for years of faithful service by changing employment. The transfer of pension credits eliminates the temptation to escape the payment of retirement benefits by discharging older workers, and is thus one of the effective means of removing the " dead line " from industry.

It will both stimulate and compel an increase in the wage standard of American industry, because if the wage of a certain class of employees has not had sufficient margin to enable them to pay their share of the cost, the act will have to be amended by a requirement that employers pay the entire cost; but it will be a financial advantage to employers, and a moral advantage in preserving the self-respect of employees, if the way is opened for employees to pay half the cost of raising the wage to a cultural wage level as an earned right, rather than to have their share of the cost presented to them by employers as a charity.

Last, and most important of all, the substitute bill furnishes a self-supporting method by which a permanent livelihood may be secured by the large excess number of employees who have been displaced from industry, and cannot be reabsorbed in industry or agriculture, and whose number is so large that it is physically impossible to create a reserve fund sufficiently large to support them in idleness, even if it were desirable to supply wages without work. For these idle detached workers, who cannot be covered by any industrial protection plan that is sound and that will permit industry to function without undue and unnecessary retarding influences and impediments, the only possible unemployment insurance is employment.

Mr. President, yesterday I had occasion to discuss the questionable validity of title II and title VIII of this bill. I am morally certain that in the course of time, if title II shall be enacted as it now stands, it will either break down of its own weight or it will come back under the condemnation of a decision of the Court. For that reason primarily, and especially since the adoption of the Clark amendment, I am offering this substitute and making this statement; and I now ask that I may insert in the RECORD a statement prepared by Mr. Henry E. Jackson, an expert in the field of social insurance, who appeared before the Finance Committee as a witness, and gave to the committee testimony when we were considering the bill now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The statement is as follows:

THE GEORGE SUBSTITUTE SOCIAL-SECURITY BILL

(A statement by Henry E. Jackson)

1. The large and important part of the Wagner social-security bill is concerned with organized industries, providing protection against the hazards of old age and unemployment. The George bill is proposed as a substitute for this part of the Wagner bill and it also covers two additional hazards not provided for in the Wagner bill.

2. The two bills are constructed on principles which are basically different; the Wagner bill provides that the Federal Government own and operate the protection plans of industry; the George bill provides that the Federal Government's function be limited to setting a standard schedule of benefits to be maintained, but permits industries a large degree of freedom in the management of their plans. The George bill is therefore in exact accord with the American principle of democracy, which aims to secure concerted action in the whole, while preserving freedom in the parts.

The Wagner bill meets the problem by the use of state socialism; the George bill uses the principle of democracy. I have no objection to state socialism applied to this problem, as we have applied it to other problems, if this is the best we can do. But I believe the democratic method is far more efficient in securing the desired results and far more helpful in the development of individual citizens.

3. The George bill provides a much larger schedule of benefits than does the Wagner bill, and yet this larger schedule of benefits is made to be financially feasible, because of the freedom of method granted industries to manage their plans, and because of the large needless operating expense eliminated by the George bill, and because of the financial assistance to industries provided in the George bill without additional expense to the Government.

4. The chief distinguishing characteristic of the George bill, here stressed, is that its method of securing the adoption of protection plans in American industries, is not compulsion, but voluntary cooperation. The specified tax in the bill may be made effective by a separate act of Congress, if, and when, it is found to be advisable.

5. The use of the voluntary method stipulated in the bill implies that the social-security board charged with the administration of the act, would use all available means for enlisting industries in the plan, giving advisory service, exhibiting the nature and advantages of the plan, and explaining how the plan can be operated on the most inexpensive basis.

The board could give a rating, like a Federal Dun & Bradstreet's on a public governmental basis, thus giving public recognition and honor to those industries, which adopted plans measuring up to or approximating the standards stipulated in the bill.

There would thus be exhibited the number of employers who do voluntarily adopt the plan, also the number who are not willing to adopt it, also those who would be willing to adopt it, if it were made universal, so that they could be on a fair basis of competition. This process would render an invaluable service in exhibiting the need there may be for compulsory legislation.

6. The education, involved in the process of volunteer enlistment of employers, would create a volume of enlightened public opinion, which would clear the way for the easy passage of compulsory legislation. The assumption is justified that a large proportion of employers will probably adopt the plan voluntarily, because all employers are facing this problem wholly apart from any proposed legislation and all intelligent employers recognize that protection of worn-out human machinery is not only just but also an economic advantage, and because an employer who does not have such a plan will find it harder to secure and retain the right type of employee than the employer who adopts such a plan, and because under this bill it will happen to employers as it does to soldiers that an element of distinction and honor attaches to a citizen who is a volunteer soldier rather than to one who is drafted and conscripted under compulsion. Whatever the number of employers who may or may not freely adopt the plan, the voluntary method will be an advantageous process as a preliminary to the use of compulsion, which will affect not those who have by that time adopted the plan, but only those who have not.

7. A bill constructed on the principle of the George bill is obviously the only type of bill which can be operated on the basis of voluntary cooperation. Please observe that freedom of action is not only the method used for securing acceptance of the plan, but after industries have adopted the plan, as stated in the bill, they are given freedom in the management and operation of their plans. The principle involved here is one of paramount importance. It is not only the democratic principle of social control but is the only principle suitable to the treatment and development of human nature. Detail rules and regulations are adapted to dogs and horses. They need them because they are dogs and horses. But what distinguishes a man from a dog or horse is his use of moral judgments. Therefore all social legislation ought not only to permit but stimulate the use of moral judgments. This is what the George bill definitely aims to do. But the Wagner bill will do conspicuous moral damage to citizens, because it is undemocratic, because it, like the original National Security Act, contains detail rules and regulations, handed down from Washington to employers permitting them no chance to use moral judgments. Men properly resent such rules or they would not be normal men. The Wagner bill if adopted will no doubt run the same course as the N. R. A. bill. It will break down of its own weight and then will be pronounced unconstitutional. Then the work will be stopped and be more than wasted, because the work of unscrambling the machinery will have to be done.

8. If a bill of the George type were enacted, for the basic reasons above stated, it will be observed that as a consequence the question of its constitutionality is wholly avoided. It is eliminated. It could not be raised. The bill imposes no penalties and does nothing more or less than establish a bureau or board, whose function is clearly specified and which offers advisory service and operates on the basis of voluntary cooperation. Therefore, as it stands the constitutional question is in no way involved. If later the Congress should pass a joint resolution making the bill's penalties effective and the Supreme Court should pronounce it unconstitutional, the only thing the Court's decision would affect would be the penalty clause and the board could continue to do the work it had already begun and there would be no wasted effect. It could continue to put the bill into operation under the sanction of public opinion instead of using two sanctions, public opinion and the tax penalty.

9. If the board should succeed in securing the voluntary enlistment of a large number of industries in a plan, which they found acceptable and beneficial both to employers and employees, it is highly probable that the Supreme Court would pronounce the taxing provision to be constitutional if Congress decided to use it. For many years we have imposed a tariff tax for an avowed purpose other than to raise revenue, namely, to protect manufacturers against the hazard of foreign competition. No question of its constitutionality has ever been raised. If then as a national policy we have imposed a tariff tax for the protection of employers, we have a conspicuous and convincing precedent for imposing a tax now under a social-security act for the purpose of protecting both employers and employees against industrial hazards, which have become a menace to the national welfare.

After a large number of industries had adopted the plan and demonstrated its usefulness, if Congress made the tax effective in order to compel the participation of the remaining industries and if then the Supreme Court should declare the tax provision to be unconstitutional, we would have established a convincing basis and ample justification for a constitutional amendment. This is a natural and customary procedure, and by the framers of the Constitution was designed and expected to be used whenever the public welfare required its use. The Constitution was made for man, not man for the Constitution. Thomas Jefferson stated in two short sentences all that needs to be said on the wisdom and necessity of amending the Constitution. He said: "Laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. We might as well require a man to wear the coat that fitted him as a boy as civilized society to remain ever under the regime of their ancestors."

It is probable, however, that no constitutional amendment will be required, because the question as to whether or not the George type of social-security bill is constitutional, does not involve a question of law, but an economic theory of the facts back of the law. The Nation has now become so completely an economic unity that we no longer have interstate commerce or intrastate commerce, we have just commerce. As soon as this economic fact is recognized as it is the constitutionality of the George bill becomes a foregone conclusion even to a layman. The method of voluntary cooperation, which the bill provides for getting itself into operation, is designed to make such a conspicuous exhibit of this economic fact that the bill's constitutionality will never be raised. Nothing is so convincing as a fact, as Chief Justice Hughes indicated in his dissenting opinion in the Railroad Retirement Act. He said, "Where the constitutional validity of a statute depends upon the existence of facts, courts must be cautious about reaching a conclusion respecting them contrary to that reached by the legislature; and if the question of what the facts establish be a fairly debatable one, it is not permissible for the judge to set up his opinion in respect of it against the opinion of the lawmaker."

10. I am informed that no bill of this character has ever been proposed or passed by the Federal Congress without effective penalties attached. This is probably true. That is the chief reason why it should be passed now as a new legislative procedure. It is likewise true that hitherto no social-security bill has been passed by the Federal Congress. It is a new kind of legislation applied to a complex industrial problem, and therefore requires a new legislative procedure. New wine calls for new bottles.

Even if we knew that the tax penalty would be ultimately necessary, it would be wise and helpful to use the method of voluntary cooperation as a preliminary process on the way to our desired goal. The shortest distance between two points is the line of least resistance. As far as it is feasible, the more excellent way is to reward men if they do, rather than to punish them if they don't.

It is a curious circumstance that we still persist in believing that the only effective legislation possible must have attached to it a penalty like a fine or imprisonment, whereas it has been repeatedly demonstrated that such penalties have been futile in securing observance of a law if it is not supported by public opinion. The prohibition law as a dramatic case in point. The democratic method is the method of freedom and, despite its obvious defects, democracy is the most efficient form of government yet devised. An illuminating definition of freedom, the only real freedom which I think we possess, would be that it is voluntary obedience to self-recognized law.

While the method here proposed applies with special force to legislation dealing with industrial problems, such as the social-security bill does, yet it is a wise working formula for many other types of legislation, because it ought to be obvious that it is not physically possible to put any law into effective operation unless we first secure a large measure of voluntary obedience to it. The George bill is definitely designed to secure as large a measure of voluntary obedience as possible to a law recognized as wise and desirable. We will dispense with penalties if we can; we will use them if we must.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have only this to say further upon the substitute: It does not carry immediate compulsion, or attempt to do so, for the reasons I have already stated; but it is the first attempt to offer an inducement through a Federal agency to industry to provide superior benefits to those specified in title II of the pending bill. Not only that, but it makes possible the doubling of those benefits by voluntary contributions by the employees themselves, though it does not relieve the employers from granting greater benefits than title II of the bill provides and covering two additional hazards to which I have already directed attention. It also holds out a strong inducement to employers to adopt this program by providing for loans from the Treasury in the form of security bonds, but to be retained in the Treasury as its protection, so as to enable industry which has not in the past made suitable provision of a reserve fund to support the plan set out in the bill, or its equivalent. That makes possible also the transfer of credits, which, of course, is an essential feature of any security plan, or of any system which undertakes to provide against industrial hazards.

Mr. President, I am not only convinced of the desirability of such a course, but I believe it will be to the real interest of the country to have an opportunity to consider more deliberately, and separated from other admittedly important proposals in a long and involved bill, the problem we are discussing, and with which I have dealt in the amendment. If and when titles II and VIII of the bill shall be again before the Congress we shall be able, I hope, to work out a program which will provide against the industrial hazards which ought to be provided against as a part of the cost of doing business.

Attached to the substitute is also provision for self-supporting villages, either of the subsistence homestead type or of any other type of homestead with which the Congress has dealt, in recognition of the fact that so large a percentage of our working people have been unable to find employment, and will through a relatively long period be unable to find employment until some way of providing employment shall be found. The benefits granted under title II of the bill when they are analyzed will be found to be exceedingly meager, and there are large groups of our population which will not participate at all in the benefits of title II. Indeed, out of some forty-five to fifty million people who ordinarily and normally are gainfully employed in the United States, approximately one-half only will be affected by title II.

Mr. President, I ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks an editorial which appeared in the New York Times of June 17, entitled "The Social Security Bill," as bearing upon what I have tried to emphasize—the necessity for more careful and more exhaustive study of the subject unembarrassed by other legislative proposals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the New York Times of June 17, 1935]

THE SOCIAL-SECURITY BILL

The Senate seems to be on the verge of debating only perfunctorily and passing quickly the full social-security bill already passed by the House. It seems almost too late to hope that a measure of so sweeping a nature will receive the close and careful study it deserves. The case for splitting it into its constituent parts is a strong one. It would obviously be desirable to break it into at least three separate measures—one providing for immediate old-age assistance and Federal contributions for maternal and child aid, a second providing for unemployment insurance, and the third providing for permanent old-age insurance. Only after such a division would each section be likely to receive sufficient consideration, and to be voted upon as its merits deserve.

The whole contributory old-age-pension scheme in particular ought to be postponed and turned over to an expert commission for study. As it stands, it imposes a gradually rising tax on both employers and employees, which at the end of 10 years, it has been estimated, will amount to $1,700,000,000 a year. This in itself would mean an added tax burden equal to nearly half of the existing total Federal tax burden. Further, it would result, it has been calculated, in the accumulation of an eventual reserve fund of the immense total of $32,000,000,000. The problem of managing such a reserve fund, and its possible social and economic effects, have not yet received anything like adequate study. Alternative types of old-age pensions ought to be considered.

Nothing has yet been done, again, about amending the major defects of the unemployment insurance plan as it stands. It still does not provide that the workers shall contribute toward their own insurance, in spite of the convincing arguments for this practice and the fact that it prevails in virtually every such system abroad. And it still, for no good reason that it would be possible to think of, levies a 3-percent tax on the total pay rolls of employers, instead of merely on that part which is paid to workers actually covered by the insurance benefits.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in view of the fact that there may be no roll call on the substitute offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], and since there are some of us who are more interested in the subject matter of old-age security than in the letter of the pending bill, which in all probability will be passed by the Senate, and as there may be some of us who seriously doubt whether the bill, if enacted into law, can receive the sanction of the Court of last resort, without taking up the time of the Senate, but entertaining an entirely sympathetic idea toward provision for old-age security and social security through a constitutional measure, which I do not believe will be passed here today, I desire to be recorded in favor of the George amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I may say just a word, although it is not directed to the particular amendment now pending, but rather to the bill.

The question of the constitutionality of title II has been raised and discussed. I presume we all recognize that title II does present a serious question. I do not think it is free from doubt. But my vote on the bill will not be controlled by the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of title II. There are provisions in the bill the constitutionality of which cannot be doubted, and I favor those provisions.

The bill provides that in case of any portion of the measure being held unconstitutional, the holding shall not affect other portions. Even if that provision were not in the bill, I think the courts would apply such a rule. In view of the portions of the bill which seem to me wholly unquestioned and which I favor, I shall vote for the measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] in the nature of a substitute for title II and title VIII.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out title II, beginning in line 15, on page 7, and ending in line 12, page 16.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is to strike out title II of the bill. As everyone knows, this title refers to the plan for annuities. I discussed the matter at length on Monday, and do not care now to take the time of the Senate, but I should like to ask, if there is to be no further discussion with respect to it, that we have a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, on which he has asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, let us have the amendment again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will again state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out title II, beginning in line 15, page 7, and ending in line 12, page 16.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate but for a few moments. Yesterday I submitted some observations concerning the pending bill and directed particular attention to titles II and VIII. I stated in substance that the bill under consideration had a number of admirable features which commanded my support, but that in my opinion titles II and VIII contained provisions which would not be sustained when challenged in the courts. It is believed by many—and I am among that number—that in view of the other provisions of the bill there should be legislation of a supplemental character providing old-age benefits. I regret that steps have not been taken, and legislation proposed of a constitutional character, that will accomplish the desired results and afford suitable and adequate annuities or old-age benefits for the class of individuals comprised within the provisions of titles II and VIII of the pending measure. However, the provisions of these two titles do not reach all the persons above the age referred to, and, indeed, deal with perhaps not exceeding 50 percent of those over the age of 65 years.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has referred to this matter and pointed out in a clear and comprehensive manner the defects in the present bill and the necessity, if the objectives sought are to be attained, of adopting a different plan from that found in titles II and VIII. As stated, there are provisions in the bill the constitutionality of which cannot be questioned, and which possess merit and should be enacted into law. The bill before us contains separate provisions and separate titles. They are as disconnected or separated as though they were in separate bills.

The bill contains, as Senators know, various titles which are so complete in themselves that the elimination of one or more would not mar or destroy those remaining. Believing as I did that titles II and VIII were subject to challenge upon the ground of being unconstitutional, I took the position, when the Committee on Finance first began the consideration of the bill, that it should be divided into separate bills and each separate part be considered as an independent measure. I especially urged that the consideration of titles II and VIII be deferred until the other provisions of the bill had been acted upon. Moreover, it was my opinion that sufficient study had not been given to the question of old-age benefits, with the intricate and technical questions involved, and that in view of the fact that if the bill as presented were enacted into law titles II and VIII would not become effective for approximately 2 years, it would be the part of wisdom to defer action upon the question of old-age benefits until the next session of Congress.

There are some Senators and many other persons who have given attention to the provisions of the bill, and particularly to titles II and VIII, who have serious doubts as to the constitutionality of the same. I believe that a definite plan should be provided which would embrace a larger part of our population than is covered in the provisions of the titles referred to. The view is entertained by many that to provide old-age benefits for perhaps less than one-half of our population over 65 years of age does not meet the situation or deal with the problem in a satisfactory manner.

It is obvious that if the bill in its present form is enacted into law, hundreds of thousands, and indeed millions, of those reaching the age of 65 years, not finding any provisions for relief in the old-age benefit features of the bill, will be relegated to title I, thus increasing the contributions to be made by the States as well as the Federal Government. The millions who will not receive old-age benefits under titles II and VIII, assuming that those provisions shall be held constitutional, will, if they obtain any relief, be compelled to avail themselves of old-age assistance or pensions, provisions for which appear in title I.

I wish a sound and satisfactory measure were before us to encompass the entire questions with which the measure before us attempts to deal. In view of the fact that the bill does have provisions of merit which I approve, and in view of the separability of the provisions, I may feel constrained to vote for the passage of the bill, though believing the titles referred to to be unsound from a constitutional standpoint.

Mr. President, as I understand, the American Association for Social Security, with headquarters at 22 East Seventeenth Street, New York City, has been active in attempting to secure pensions and social-security legislation. I am advised that Mr. Epstein is connected with this association and, as Senators know, he has for many years earnestly sought to secure State legislation providing for old-age pensions. I am in receipt of a memorandum distributed by this organization a short time ago, which contains an analysis of H. R. 7260, and which gives some attention to title II and title VIII of the pending bill. It states that the provisions in these titles place the largest burden of the future support of the aged upon the workers and industry. Reference is made to the enormous reserves which will be built up.

> These reserves will be frozen for many years. The committee estimates that under this bill there will be a reserve fund of over 10 billion dollars by 1948 and the reserve will amount to over 32 billion dollars by 1970. Such enormous reserves are unprecedented.

The statement further continues:

> The removal of so much purchasing power in the next few years may hamper recovery and cause great social harm. It is extremely questionable whether our economic system can stand the withdrawal of so much needed purchasing power.

The statement further continues:

> In setting up such high contributions the bill places a back-breaking burden upon the present generation. The younger generation, as taxpayers, will not only have to pay the cost of the non-contributory pension system, as well as the largest part of the benefits under the contributory system for those now middle-aged, but will be forced to provide fully for its own old age.

It is further stated that—

> The plan under this bill is to build up large reserves out of contributions by employers and employees in order to make the plan self-sustaining in as short a period as possible, so as to relieve the Government from much of its expenditures on non-contributory old-age pensions. We believe that self-sustaining annuities cannot be wisely built up in a short period, and that it is especially unwise to accumulate large reserves from contributions levied largely upon wage and salaried workers without any help from the Government out of funds derived from the higher income recipients in the Nation.

Without assenting to all of the statements above quoted, they furnish, it seems to me, sufficient reason for a further study of the important question of old-age annuities. The statement further continues:

> In view of the technical complications of the subject it would probably be advisable to strike out completely titles II and VIII from this bill. A congressional committee should be created to study the subject further and report to the next session of Congress.

I have called attention to this statement because of the study which has been given to pensions, old-age insurance, old-age benefits, and so forth, by the organization from whose statement I have quoted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] to strike title II from the bill. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KING (when his name was called). Upon this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. NYE's name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota

[Mr. NYE] is detained by illness. He has a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. If the Senator from North Dakota were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business. I am advised that these Senators would vote "nay" if present.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], and the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], are unavoidably detained.

Mr. BULKLEY. I repeat the announcement of my general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], who is detained on important public business, and vote "nay."

Mr. HAYDEN. My colleague, the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], is necessarily detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 63, as follows:

YEAS—15

Austin	George	Keyes	Townsend
Barbour	Gore	Metcalf	Vandenberg
Capper	Hale	Smith	White
Dickinson	Hastings	Steiwer

So Mr. HASTINGS' amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I offer a clarifying amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 13, after the word "plan", it is proposed to strike out "one-half"; and in line 14, after the word "collected", it is proposed to insert:

A part thereof in proportion to the part of the old-age assistance which represents the payments made by the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 46, line 19, after "per centum", it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That the tax levied in this act to be paid by the employer shall not in any event exceed 1 percent of the gross receipts of the business of the employer.

And on page 52, line 24, after "per centum", it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That the tax levied in this act to be paid by the employer shall not in any event exceed 1 percent of the gross receipts of the business of the employer.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I have spoken to the chairman of the committee with respect to this amendment, and he has stated that he has no figures to show whether or not its adoption would greatly reduce the amount contemplated to be raised under the bill. I have asked that he accept the amendment and take it to conference, and find out in the meantime whether or not it would seriously interfere with the amount. He has not definitely promised, but I think he is about to do so.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Delaware knows that personally I would do anything in the world for him; but this amendment is rather involved, it is uncertain in its terms and in its effect, and I fear it is really so important that I should rather have the Senate pass upon it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, this amendment has been suggested by the service industries. The particular industries interested in the amendment are those which are conducting the beauty parlors. There are 57,000 recognized shops, employing 240,000 people, doing a gross annual business of $400,000,000, with certain fixed obligations in connection with leases and equipment and taxes which cannot be passed on, and which, having the practical effect of a 25-percent reduction of the gross business done, must necessarily be absorbed in the nonfixed factors of the business.

The object of the bill is to assist employees where practically all the expense, or a large part of the expense, is in the pay roll. In this particular industry it is contended that it is not possible to pass on to the consumer the expense in question, as will be done in most cases, and that 1 percent on the gross receipts is a sufficient tax to place upon any industry at this or any other time.

I hope the chairman of the committee will consent to take the amendment to conference, and ascertain just what effect a tax of 1 percent on this industry will have upon the bill itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the amendment I intend to offer tracks very closely the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], except that his amendment would affect some large concerns, such as the large telephone companies and the large telegraph companies, and the like. The Senate has just rejected his amendment.

The pending bill imposes a tax of 3 percent on the pay rolls of all employers included within the terms of the measure as a contribution to the unemployment insurance fund. A tax of 3 percent on the pay rolls of individuals and partnerships engaged in rendering personal services, such as barber shops, cleaning and pressing establishments, beauty parlors, and the like, will in some instances amount to 25 percent of their net earnings. A tax of 25 percent on net earnings is, of course, disproportionate and excessive, and would in some cases be destructive of the business itself.

To meet this situation and remedy this injustice—to protect the little fish against the big ones—I am offering an amendment tracking the amendment just offered by the Senator from Delaware, but limiting the application of this 1-percent tax to firms and partnerships. In other words, my amendment provides that if 3 percent on the pay rolls of these small concerns exceeds 1 percent of their gross earnings, then 1 percent of their gross earnings shall constitute the limit of their payments rather than the 3 percent of their payrolls. This might prove a life preserver in many deserving cases.

Mr. President, what I have primarily in mind is this: The amendment I offer will limit the tax on such concerns as cleaning and pressing outfits, barber shops, beauty parlors, and small concerns which are engaged in rendering personal service. I have here a computation which I shall ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD. In some instances 3 percent of the pay rolls of these small concerns will amount to 25 percent of their net earnings. That is unfair. It will either put these concerns out of business, or seriously cripple them. It will oblige them in many cases either to reduce the pay or reduce the number of their employees. Either of these results is undesirable. My amendment will limit it to individuals or to partnerships. It does not include corporations or stronger concerns which could pay the 3 percent tax on pay rolls and survive.

I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment and allow it to go to conference, because there is certainly justification or at least there is reason why we ought seriously to consider the matter before we impose upon these little concerns a tax which may put them out of business, and certainly will cripple them most seriously.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement showing how excessive this 3-percent tax is with respect to some of these small concerns.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

To the Finance Committee, Senate of the United States:

Memorandum suggesting the necessity and advisability of making certain exceptions or modifications to the pay-roll tax rates provided for by the economic-security bill so as to alleviate the unequally heavy incidence of the tax in those businesses where the proportion of pay-roll expenditures to total business turnover is unusually high

We have been consulted in recent days by several business concerns engaged in what might be called personal-service activities concerning the contemplated pay-roll taxes in the economic-security bill. As a result of information submitted to us by them, as well as an independent investigation of our own into the statistical and operating aspects of various types of personal-service businesses, we feel that these clients are justified in their conviction that businesses of their class will suffer irreparable damage if the pay-roll taxes are applied categorically without regard to the unusual operating factors involved.

It is obvious that a tax of 3 percent on pay rolls (considering for the moment merely the tax for unemployment-insurance purposes) may have a relatively light incidence upon an industry in which the pay-roll expenditures constitute a small proportion of the gross income, say 5 percent to 15 percent. In some businesses, and this is especially true in organizations of a personal-service character, such as laundries, barber shops, beauty parlors, telephone and telegraph companies, etc., the pay-roll expenditures may, and usually do, constitute 50 percent or more of the total business turn-over. For example this figure is reported to be 60 percent for the telephone industry, and 75 percent for the motion-picture production industry.

Perhaps a concrete illustration will help to demonstrate the effect of the application of the contemplated tax on a business with an unusually high pay-roll factor. In the beauty-shop industry the pay-roll averages about 52 percent of the gross income. The net income in the industry is estimated at about 6 percent of the gross business. The tax of 3 percent on the pay rolls would be equal to 1½ percent of the gross income, or 25 percent of the net income. As consumer habits and standards will make it largely impossible to pass any substantial part of this tax on, it becomes tantamount to a tax of 25 percent on the net income, or a reduction of 25 percent in the gross business done.

This industry has 57,000 recognized shops, employing 240,000 people, and does a gross annual business of $400,000,000. With certain fixed obligations in leases and equipment a tax which cannot be passed on, and which would have the practical effect of a 25-percent reduction of the gross business done, must necessarily be absorbed in the nonfixed factors of the business. It is bound, therefore, to have a depressing and damaging effect upon wages and salaries in the industry.

It would seem that there is a reasonable and practical solution of this difficulty consistent not only with the purposes of the economic security bill but also in harmony with the larger economic and social program of which it is a part. We believe that this could be accomplished by amending the pay-roll tax provisions and rates of the bill so that they would in effect provide that the pay-roll tax at the existing rates should not exceed 1 percent of the gross business of the employer. Such a modification would sufficiently alleviate the unduly heavy and unequal incidence of the pay-roll tax in such industries with a high pay-roll factor to enable the tax to be absorbed without the alternative consequences of either destructive absorption of the tax by the business, including its labor, or a loss of business and consequent unemployment from consumer resistance to increased prices.

Mr. GORE. I hope the chairman of the committee will not object to this amendment going to conference.

Mr. HARRISON. I am afraid that if I should agree to it the Senate would overrule me about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator offers an amendment?

Mr. GORE. Yes; I offer the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has put it in his pocket, the Chair understands.

Mr. GORE. Yes; that is a sort of a pocket veto. [Laughter.] I send the amendment to the desk and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 46, line 19, after the words "per centum", it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, however, That the tax levied in this act to be paid by the employer if an individual or partnership shall not in any event exceed one percent of the gross receipts of the business of the employer.

And after the words "per centum", in line 24 on page 52, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That the tax levied in this act to be paid by the employer if an individual or partnership shall not in any event exceed one percent of the gross receipts of the business of the employer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have read. The amendment speaks for itself. I have offered it before. I offer it once again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the President is empowered in his discretion to allocate funds appropriated by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 for the purpose of making payment or settlement, in whole or in part, in cash or on the installment plan (as may be agreed upon between the President and the beneficiary) of adjusted-service certificates issued to the veterans of the World War, less in any case the amount of any loan or indebtedness secured by such certificate: Provided, That the amount of said funds required to carry out the provisions of this section is hereby made available for such purpose.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this amendment. I offered the amendment in the committee, and it was voted down. I have discussed it on the floor of the Senate. It simply authorizes the President, in his discretion, to make payment of the soldier's bonus in whole or in part, in cash or on the installment plan, or in such way as may be agreed upon between the President and the holder of the certificate. It is purely in the discretion of the President. There is nothing mandatory about it.

I have offered the amendment before, and in order to keep my record straight I offer it again. I think this is a judicious way in which to pay the bonus in whole or in part at the present time. It is the only way in which it could be done. This is perhaps the last bill to which such an amendment would be appropriate. It is appropriate, it is pertinent, to this social-security bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, at this point I desire to place in the RECORD a statement in a few words as to my vote on this bill. I am going to vote for this amendment also. My vote will be recorded in favor of the bill, though not because I think the bill will do any good. I think the bill in the long run probably will do harm, averaged up one side and down the other, as I expect it to be administered. I do not see much chance of very much good being done by it.

However, the old-age pension and unemployment relief features of the bill I originally sponsored in the Senate in a resolution I submitted and in a bill I introduced, and I would not have the public think this administration has in any respect been obstructed in what it claims to be a gesture of public service.

The bill is apparently intended to do a great deal of good, but it provides for levying more taxes and probably imposing a great deal more of burden than any good it will do; and in its undertaking to make every man who draws a pension establish himself as a public pauper it creates an embarrassment before it allows anyone to receive any benefits, and then leaves it hazardous as to there being any benefits, because at the most only 1 out of 10 can be accommodated under the bill.

However, when there has been any reasonable ground for expecting good to be done I have recorded my vote for these measures of all kinds. There is some reasonable ground here to expect that good may come from the bill. However, Mr. President, I wish to say that I have not a doubt about the bill being unconstitutional.

I am willing, however, to waive my own opinion on the question of constitutionality in favor of the opinion of those who claim to be better students of the Constitution. I have seen at least nine "brain trusters" on the floor of the Senate since the bill has been under consideration, all of whom evidently claim the bill to be constitutional. Since it is the order of the day to accept the opinion of the "brain trusters" on all constitutional questions which may arise, I am not so sure that before the case would reach the Supreme Court some of the judges of the Supreme Court might die and some of these "brain trusters" might be placed on the Supreme Court bench in time to consider the bill when it shall reach that Court for consideration. That being so, there is that chance of the bill being declared constitutional. I shall give them the benefit of any hazard of a doubt which might accidentally flow into consideration of the bill.

I would have it known by my record that there is no desire on my part to obstruct anything having a pretense of being for the public good, though in this case, as in others similar to it, I shall be very much surprised if a single member of the Court, if it shall remain constituted as it is today, should hesitate for an instant to declare the bill unconstitutional. I should be even more surprised if a single bit of good should come out of the bill, but I give the sponsors of the bill all the benefit of the doubt.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to have a yea-and-nay vote. Other Senators may desire it or may not desire it. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], who is unavoidably detained. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. NYE's name was called). I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] is paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is necessarily detained. The junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] is absent on account of illness. If present, he would vote "yea." I am informed that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], with whom he is paired, would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who is unavoidably detained. I am informed that if present, he would vote as I have voted. Therefore I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BULKLEY. I repeat my announcement of my general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY]. I am advised that if he were present, he would vote as I intend to vote. I am therefore free to vote. I vote "yea."

Their names being called, Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. GORE answered "present."

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily detained in an important committee meeting.

The Senator from UTAH [Mr. THOMAS] is necessarily detained on important public business. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 77, nays 6, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, blind persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment-compensation laws; to establish a Social Security Board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes."

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, ask for a conference thereon with the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will appoint the Senate conferees later.

The VICE PRESIDENT subsequently appointed Mr. HARRISON, Mr. KING, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. KEYES, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE conferees on the part of the Senate.

FARMERS' HOME CORPORATION

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2367, commonly known as the "farm tenant bill."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2367) to create the Farmers' Home Corporation, to promote more secure occupancy of farms and farm homes, to correct the economic instability resulting from some present forms of farm tenancy, to engage in rural rehabilitation, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, with an amendment.

SENATOR FROM WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, on the 3d day of last January the credentials of the Senator-elect from West Virginia were laid before the Senate. The Senator-elect [Mr. RUSH D. HOLT] is now present and ready to take the oath of office.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, on April 18, 1935, and subsequently during the month of May, two petitions in the nature of protest and contest were filed with the Senate, and by the Senate referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The committee has had under consideration the protest of Henry D. Hatfield, former Senator from West Virginia, who likewise claimed the seat in the Senate, and has also considered the memorial of various citizens from the State of West Virginia in the matter of RUSH D. HOLT, Senator-elect from the State of West Virginia. The committee is now ready to report, and begs leave to submit its report—Senate Report 904.

While I have the floor, I desire to state that conforming to the statement made by me yesterday in the Senate, I express the hope that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] will permit Mr. HOLT to stand aside, and the committee's report to be printed in the RECORD and as a document, together with such minority views as may be presented by members of the committee, and that the matter may go over for the day without prejudice.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that was the understanding had yesterday; and I assume that the senior Senator from West Virginia is willing to abide by that agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Georgia whether the minority views to which he has referred have been submitted, or are ready to be submitted.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the minority views are ready.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the observations I have made in regard to this particular case I have committed to writing, submitted them to the committee this morning, and I ask that they may be printed with the majority report and be available to the Senate tomorrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the majority report will be printed in the RECORD and as a document, and the minority views will follow the majority report.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I have just conferred with my colleague-elect. He informs me that he is quite willing to stand aside in order to carry out the agreement which was made yesterday. I now give notice, however, that this privileged matter will be called up tomorrow, and I shall insist on its being kept before the Senate until it shall be disposed of.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, there are other minority views in addition to those submitted by the Senator from California. I assume that the Chair's ruling will apply to all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All minority views which are filed with the clerk tonight.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not at all sure that all minority views are as yet ready for submission.

Mr. ROBINSON. In that connection I should like to suggest that it would be well to have all minority views, if they are ready, filed for printing, so that they may be available for use tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. I am advised that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] will not have his views ready for submission until tomorrow. He has not quite had time to complete them.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like to state the situation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. The majority views were not known in detail until the meeting of the committee today. The meeting lasted until the Senate convened. The only time the minority have had to comment upon the views of the majority is since the session of the Senate began at 12 o'clock today. During that time an effort has been made to write briefly such comment; but there have been many roll calls, and the work has been interrupted.

If this permission could be extended until 12 o'clock tonight, I think the work could be completed by that time. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that until 12 o'clock tonight he may be permitted to file minority views to go with the majority report and the minority views offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope that request will be granted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should like to state that that will facilitate the proceedings in connection with the credentials of the Senator-elect from West Virginia. It is desired to take up the matter tomorrow. I understand there has been a tentative agreement to that effect, and I hope that may be done.

The report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and the minority views submitted by Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. AUSTIN are as follows:

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report relative to the contest of Henry D. Hatfield against RUSH D. HOLT for a seat in the United States Senate from the State of West Virginia:

In the West Virginia primary election of August 8, 1934, RUSH D. HOLT was declared the nominee of the Democratic Party and Henry D. Hatfield the nominee of the Republican Party for the office of United States Senator. In the general election on November 7, 1934, RUSH D. HOLT received 349,882 votes and Henry D. Hatfield, 281,756 votes. The secretary of state duly made return of the election of RUSH D. HOLT to the Governor, who issued a certificate in due form, certifying the election of RUSH D. HOLT to the Secretary of the United States Senate, before the beginning of the Seventy-fourth Congress, which convened January 3, 1935.

On April 18, 1935, Henry D. Hatfield presented his petition in the nature of a protest and contest to the Senate of the United States, alleging the election of RUSH D. HOLT to be void and praying the Senate to declare the seat vacant and the petitioner, who received the next highest number of legal votes cast in the November election, 1934, the duly elected Senator. This petition was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Subsequently, a number of citizens of the State of West Virginia presented to the Senator a memorial, alleging that the election of RUSH D. HOLT was void and that the State was without its proper representation in the Senate. The memorialists also prayed the Senate to declare the seat vacant in order that the Governor of West Virginia might fill the vacancy as provided by law. This memorial was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The petition of Henry D. Hatfield and the memorial of the several citizens of the State of West Virginia allege that the said RUSH D. HOLT was born July 19, 1905, and will not be 30 years of age until June 19, 1935, and is, therefore, disqualified to become a Member of the Senate by virtue of the provisions of article I, section 3, paragraph 3, of the Constitution of the United States.

It is also alleged that the primary election laws of West Virginia require each candidate to file a certificate as to his eligibility and good faith in seeking office, among other qualifying facts. In the primary election of August 1934 it is averred that such certificate was filed in the office of the Secretary of State of West Virginia by the said RUSH D. HOLT, but that the certificate was not acknowledged before a notary public of the county in which it purported to have been executed. It is insisted that the statement of RUSH D. HOLT contained in his qualifying certificate, "I am eligible to hold the said office", was not a true statement, for the reason that he was not on that date eligible to the office of United States Senator for which he certified himself to be a candidate and also that he could not subscribe to the further statement that he was a candidate for the said office in good faith.

At the hearing held by your committee June 1, 1935, Henry D. Hatfield and the memorialists were represented by counsel; RUSH D. HOLT appeared in person. It was admitted that the said RUSH D. HOLT was born June 19, 1905; that during the political campaigns preceding both the primary and the general elections his correct age was repeatedly stated to the voters of West Virginia. It is not in dispute that the question of his ability to fulfill the constitutional requirement as to age was raised and freely and openly discussed in the newspaper and in public political meetings throughout the State of West Virginia. It was with the full knowledge that the said RUSH D. HOLT was not in fact 30 years of age on November 7, 1934, and would not become 30 years of age until June 19, 1935, that the voters of West Virginia elected him a Senator in the November election of 1934. It appeared without dispute that the said RUSH D. HOLT has not presented himself to the Senate as a Senator-elect and has not been sworn and taken his seat as a Senator from the State of West Virginia. On the contrary, the said RUSH D. HOLT announced his intention to present himself for the purpose of qualifying as a Senator when he had became 30 years of age, to wit, on June 19, 1935.

At the outset your committee is of the opinion that the acknowledgment of the certificate required by the primary election laws of West Virginia before an officer who was not in fact an officer of the county in which the certificate purported to have been executed is of no consequence. It appears that the acknowledgment was taken before an officer of the State and that the certificate was not in fact executed in the county stated in the caption thereof. No objection whatever was made to the certificate prior to the primary election, and the name of the said RUSH D. HOLT appeared upon the Democratic ticket as a candidate for the United States Senate. No exception whatever was taken to the placing of the name of RUSH D. HOLT upon the ballot as the candidate of the Democratic Party in the general election of November 1934.

Also, your committee is of the opinion that the statements made by the said RUSH D. HOLT in such certificate were not intended to mislead and did not in fact mislead voters of West Virginia. At most, the candidate was merely stating his conclusions of law based upon facts correctly stated by him to the voters of West Virginia.

Also, that the said Henry D. Hatfield, by virtue of his having received the next highest number of eligible votes for United States Senator in the general election held in and for the State of West Virginia in November 1934, is not the duly elected Senator from the State of West Virginia. The rule is well settled that in election cases the ineligibility of a majority candidate for a seat in the Congress gives no title to the minority candidate or to the candidate receiving the next highest number of votes. See Jones v. Mann (40th Cong.); Rowell's Digest 220, 2 Bartlett 475; Cannon v. Campbell (47th Cong.), Rowell's Digest 391.

The ultimate question raised by both the petition and the memorial is: As of what date is the age qualification for a Senator provided for in article I, section 3, paragraph 3, of the Constitution to be determined? That is,

(1) Does it apply to the date of election; or

(2) Does it apply to the date of the beginning of the term of office for which the Senator was elected; or

(3) Does it apply to the date the Senator-elect is sworn and takes his seat?

Article I, section 3, paragraph 3, of the Constitution reads as follows:

"No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years, and been 9 years a citizen of the United States and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen."

The quoted paragraph is a sentence of two clauses joined by the conjunction "and." The first clause or sentence completely provides for the qualifications of age and citizenship in a Senator, not in a Senator-elect or a candidate for the senatorial office. Had the sentence ended here it would clearly appear that the age qualification could not be made to apply to the date of election. A second clause was added clearly providing for habitancy "when elected." The proper grammatical construction would seem to be that the words "when elected" modify the word "person" in the first clause only as the subject of the second sentence or clause. In other words, they have no relation to the verbs "shall not have" and "been" in the first clause. The proceedings of the Constitutional Convention upon the clause under consideration, attached hereto as "Exhibit A", strongly indicate, as the language of the clause itself implies, that the qualifications of age and citizenship relate solely to actual and not potential senatorship.

In the opinion of your committee, the qualifying words "when elected", appearing as they do in the center of the second separate clause, relate only to habitancy.

It may be suggested that the date of election is nevertheless controlling, because a Senator-elect becomes a Member of Congress on the day of his election and must have fulfilled all of the requirements provided in paragraph 3 before that date. If a Senator-elect became a Member of Congress at the time of his election, it would have been wholly unnecessary to insert the words "when elected" in paragraph 3, since all of the qualifications therein provided for automatically would have attached at the date of election. The language of the clause itself precludes the suggestion that a Senator-elect becomes a Member of the Senate at the time of his election. See Hammond v. Herrick (Clarke and Hall Contested Elections, H. R. U. S., p. 287).

As a Senator-elect obviously does not automatically become a Member of Congress at the beginning of the term of office for which he was elected, no substantial reason can be found in the Constitution why his qualifications of either age or citizenship should be measured at that time. The thoroughly considered report of the House Committee on Elections in Hammond v. Herrick, supra, is in point:

"Our rule in this particular is different from that of the House of Commons; it is also better, for it makes our theory conform to what is fact in both countries, that the act of becoming in reality a Member of the House, depends wholly upon the will of a person elected and returned. Election does not, of itself, constitute membership, although the period may have arrived at which the congressional term commences. * * * Neither does a return necessarily confer membership. * * * Neither do election and return create membership."

In cases arising under article I, section 6, of the Constitution, which provides against a Member of Congress holding another office under the United States, the House of Representatives has uniformly held that a Representative-elect does not necessarily become a Member of the Congress on either the date of election or of the beginning of the term of office for which the Representative was elected.

Section 6 provides for a fourth qualification in a Representative. The specific time as of which this qualification must be met is not stated, but since "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office", it necessarily follows that this fourth qualification must be met at the time of the commencement of actual membership in either House. It has never been held, so far as your committee is advised, that the fourth qualification contained in article I, section 6, of the Constitution must be met by a Member-elect of either House of Congress either on the date of his election or on the date of the commencement of the term to which he was elected. Again, the fourth qualification is to be determined as of the date when the Senator-elect becomes in fact a Senator. The date on which a Senator-elect presents himself to the Senate of the United States, is sworn, and takes his seat, should be determinative of the age qualifications of article I, section 3, paragraph 3, of the Constitution.

The first clause of section 3, article I, of the Constitution, changed by the seventeenth amendment, provides:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the people thereof for six years; and each Senator shall have 1 vote."

The second clause of section 3, article I—which follows immediately—directs that after the Senators "shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year; of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year; and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year."

The first section of the twentieth amendment to the Constitution reads:

"The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin."

While the Constitution provides for the senatorial term of 6 years, it is obvious, we think, that a Senator-elect is not from the beginning of the term to which he is elected a Senator in the Congress within the meaning of clause 3, section 3, of article I. While the Senate is a continuing body, the Senate, as a body and not as individual Members thereof, "shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its" Members, and a majority of the Senate "shall constitute a quorum to do business" (art. I, sec. 5, clause 1, of the Constitution).

When, as in this case, the qualifications of a person to "be a Senator" shall be called in question, the inquiry logically would seem to be whether such person is then qualified under the Constitution, or specifically, under clause 3, section 3, of article I thereof. Where, as in this case, the Senator-elect at the time when he presents himself to take his seat in the Senate, possesses all of the qualifications required under the Constitution, a negative vote against his seating would not exclude a disqualified person from membership in the Senate.

The practical objective of the framers of the Consitution was to exclude from the membership of the Senate anyone who had not at the time of the assumption of the senatorial office been for 9 years a citizen of the United States. The fear of foreign influence and the wholesome distrust of those who had but recently disclaimed allegiance to a foreign power undoubtedly accounts for the citizenship clause in the Constitution. Likewise the framers of the Constitution sought to exclude immature persons from the deliberations of the Senate. The whole purpose of the Constitution is subserved by the exclusion of the person who is lacking in age and on citizenship qualifications at the time he presents himself as a Member of the Senate and demands the right to participate in the deliberations thereof. The habitancy qualification must, of course, be determined as of the date of election. The Constitution expressly requires it. Again the reason is consistent with the definite purpose of the framers of the Constitution. States, or districts thereof, during the Revolution had been represented by inhabitants of other States. This fact was well known to the members of the convention. To effectively protect the weaker States from the influence of the larger and more powerful States, it was expressly provided that no person shall be a Senator "who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen."

Looking to the precedents in the House of Representatives, John Young Brown was elected a Representative from Kentucky to the Thirty-sixth Congress. Not being of the age of 25 years, either when elected or at the beginning of the term, Brown waited and was sworn when he attained the required age. (See first session, 36th Cong. Globe, pp. 25 and 31.) In Jefferson's House Manual the following note appears:

"A Member-elect not being of the required age, he was not enrolled by the Clerk and did not take the oath until he had reached the required age."

HENRY ELLENBOGEN was elected as the Representative of the Thirty-third Congressional District of Pennsylvania to the Congress of the United States at the general election on November 8, 1932. Under the naturalization laws, ELLENBOGEN, a native of Austria, became a citizen of the United States June 17, 1926. At the time of his election he had been a citizen of the United States 6 years and 5 months, and 6 years 8½ months on March 4, 1933, the beginning of the term for which he was elected. He had been a citizen of the United States for more than 7½ years on January 3, 1934, when he presented himself to the House and was sworn and took his seat. ELLENBOGEN was permitted to retain his seat, the House being of the opinion that clause 2, section 2, of article I of the Constitution requires a person, to be a Representative, to have been a citizen of the United States 7 years prior to the date on which he presented himself, was sworn and took his seat.

In the Senate Henry Clay was seated and served before he was 30 years of age. Likewise, Armstead Mason, of Virginia, and John Eaton, of Tennessee, each qualified as Senators from their respective States and assumed the duties of the senatorial office before they were 30 years of age. No objection was made to the seating of Henry Clay, and it appears that he himself was probably unaware of the age qualification. His case is not relied upon as a precedent. Likewise, the cases of Mason and Eaton are not cited as precedents because, no question having been raised, each of these cases is at most a mere physical precedent.

Two Senate precedents demand notice:

(1) The Gallatin case. (See 1, Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives, sec. 428, and authorities there cited.)

There are few more distinguished names in the history of the United States than that of Albert Gallatin. Many were the public services that he rendered during a long and active life. Subsequent to the events with which we are concerned he served as Secretary of the United States Treasury for a longer period of time than has any other person in the history of the Nation.

Mr. Gallatin was born in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1761 and came to this country in 1780. In October 1785 he took the oath of allegiance to the State of Virginia. Having moved to Pennsylvania in December 1785, and having become a prominent resident of that State, he was elected a Senator from Pennsylvania in February 1793 and took his seat in December of that year. A question having been raised regarding the validity of his election, the Senate considered the matter and passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the election of Albert Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States for the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States."

In the debate it was contended that Mr. Gallatin had never become a citizen of the United States, the oath of allegiance to Virginia being insufficient to accomplish that result; but the language of the resolution showed that Congress rejected this contention. That language shows that Mr. Gallatin's qualifications were regarded as defective not because he was not a citizen of the United States at all, but rather because he was not a citizen of 9 years' standing.

(2) The Shields case. (See Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives, sec. 429, and authorities there cited.)

Gen. James A. Shields, an alien by birth, was elected to the Senate from the State of Illinois on January 13, 1849, for the term of 6 years from the 3d of March following. The oath of office was administered to General Shields on March 6, 1849, but a question was raised regarding his qualifications as a Senator and protracted debate ensued. It appeared that General Shields had been naturalized on October 21, 1840, so that at the commencement of his term of office he lacked about 7 months of having been a citizen for 9 years.

A resolution was presented in words:

"That the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States for the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States."

Upon motion of John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, the resolution was amended by the addition of the words "at the commencement of the term for which he was elected", and was passed, as amended, on March 15, 1849. As passed, the resolution read:

"Resolved, That the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States for the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States at the commencement of the term for which he was elected."

The Revels case (Hinds' Precedents of the House of Representatives, sec. 40) seems not directly in point. The attention of your committee has been called to no other case having a material bearing upon the question presented in the instant case.

Referring to the Gallatin case, it affirmatively appears that at the date of his election, at the beginning of the term for which he was elected, and at the time of his appearance in the Senate, he had not been a citizen of the United States for 9 years. In any event, Mr. Gallatin did not fulfill the constitutional requirements.

In the Shields case, it likewise affirmatively appears that on the date of his election, at the commencement of the term to which he was elected and at the date when he presented himself to take the oath and assume the duties of his office, he had not been a citizen of the United States for 9 years. It is important also to note that neither Mr. Gallatin nor General Shields had been a citizen of the United States for 9 years on the date when final adverse action was taken by the Senate of the United States.

In the opinion of your committee, the foregoing is of importance.

The conclusion which your committee has reached is contrary to the resolution adopted in the Gallatin case; it is likewise in conflict with the resolution of the Senate in the Shields case, but the rule which we believe to be the proper one would have resulted in the exclusion of both Mr. Gallatin and General Shields under the admitted facts in each case. The rule which we have recommended to the Senate meets the reasonable and obvious purpose of the framers of the Constitution, as we have endeavored to point out. The committee presents the following resolution:

"Resolved, That RUSH D. HOLT is entitled to his seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of West Virginia; it appearing that he was 30 years of age at the time when he presented himself to the Senate to take the oath and to assume the duties of the office."

RECORDS OF THE FEDERAL CONVENTION

1787—May 29: "Resolved, That the Members of the second branch of the National Legislature (the Senate) ought to be elected by those of the first, out of a proper number of persons nominated by the individual legislatures to be of the age of —— years at least." (Farrand, vol. 1, p. 20.)

June 12: The above blank filled in with "Thirty" (F. pp. 211, 217, 221).

June 13: "Resolved, That the Members of the second branch of the National Legislature ought to be chosen by the individual legislatures, to be of the age of 30 years at least" (F. 228, 235).

June 25: Further approval of the age of 30 years (F. 395, 408, 415).

June 26: Practically same as June 13 (F. 435, and vol. 2, 129).

July 24–26: "The qualification of (a) Senators shall be the age of 25 years at least; citizenship in the United States and property, to the amount of —— (F. vol. 2, 141).

"Every member of the Senate shall be of the age of 30 years at least, shall have been a citizen of the United States for at least 4 years before his election, and shall be at the time of his election a resident of the State for which he shall be chosen" (F. vol. 2, 155, 165, 179).

August 9: Above amended by inserting the word "of" after the word "citizen" and substituting the words "an inhabitant" for the words "a resident", and the word "nine" for the word "four" (F. vol. 2, 229, 239).

August 13: The substitution of the word "nine" confirmed (vol. 2, pp. 266, 272–273, 281).

September 10: Reported as above by Committee of Style (F. vol. a, p. 565).

September 12: Reported as follows by Committee of Style: "No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years and been 9 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen" (F. vol. 2, p. 591).

September 17: Passed in above form (F. vol. 2, 652).

MINORITY VIEWS OF MR. HASTINGS, MR. AUSTIN, AND MR. DICKINSON

The undersigned members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the election of RUSH D. HOLT to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having attained the age of 30 years at the commencement of the term for which he was elected."

The Constitution provides in article I, section 3, that:

"No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained the age of 30 years, and been 9 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen."

Mr. HOLT stated before the committee that he was born on the 19th day of June 1905. His term of office as a Senator began on January 3, 1935, 5 months and 13 days before he attained the age of 30 years. The credentials of his election were laid upon the desk of the Vice President on January 3, 1935, but Mr. HOLT did not present himself to take the oath.

It appears that his name was placed upon the pay roll at the beginning of his term and that he appointed secretaries and clerks who were also placed upon the pay roll.

It cannot, therefore, be contended that he has declined the office to which he was elected but, on the contrary, these things show that he definitely accepted the office.

There are two precedents which we think are controlling, particularly in view of the fact that the first one was decided as early as February 28, 1794, and the second one on March 15, 1849.

The first one was the Gallatin case. Mr. Gallatin lacked the required 9 years' citizenship by about 8 months, and the Senate adopted a resolution declaring that his election was void because of such disqualification.

The second case was the Shields case, in which General Shields lacked about 7 months of the 9 years' citizenship requirement. The Senate on March 15, 1849, adopted a resolution declaring his election void because he did not possess the required qualifications "at the commencement of the term for which he was elected."

During the campaign it appears that Mr. HOLT cited the instance of Henry Clay, who apparently was sworn in as Senator 2 or 3 months before he became 30 years of age. The majority of the committee, however, make no point of this for the reason that the question was not raised in the Senate and therefore cannot be considered as a precedent.

We think the plain language of the Constitution means that a United States Senator must be 30 years of age when his term begins. While in the case of Mr. HOLT the age requirement lacked a little less than 6 months in time, the principle involved would be the same if he lacked 5 years and 6 months. To decide that a person elected to the United States Senate could wait until shortly before his term had expired and until he had arrived at the age of 30 years is placing a construction upon the provisions of the Constitution that is wholly unwarranted; would establish a principle which might readily result in greatly diminishing the number of Senators provided for by the Constitution.

This is the first case of this kind that has been brought to the attention of the Senate. It is admitted by the majority of the committee that if Mr. HOLT had presented himself to the Senate on January 3, it would have been the duty of the Senate to decline him his seat, because he had not arrived at the constitutional age. The contention is made, however, that the fact that he did not present himself until he arrived at the age of 30 years, presents an entirely different question, and the Senate ought now to decide that question in favor of seating him. We submit, however, that the question cannot be so easily disposed of without violating precedents, and without putting ourselves and our successors in a very embarrassing position.

It is assumed that the Senate will not be required to meet this question very often, if ever again. It must not be overlooked, however, that it establishes another principle that frequently confronts the Senate. To hold in favor of seating Mr. HOLT is to hold that a person elected to the Senate does not become a Senator until he takes the oath of office. The twentieth amendment to the Constitution provides that the terms of Senators shall end at noon on the 3d day of January and the terms of their successors shall then begin. To hold that a Senator need not be qualified to take the oath of office at the beginning of his term and that he may postpone taking the oath until he has attained the age of qualification, necessarily establishes the principle that a person elected to the Senate does not become a Senator until he has taken the required oath. The practice and the established precedents are that a person elected to the Senate becomes a United States Senator at the beginning of his term and it does not depend upon the time he takes the oath of office.

The senior Senator from Nevada, Mr. PITTMAN, raised this question in a resolution presented to the Senate on December 8, 1931, in relation to the appointment of Senator BARBOUR, of New Jersey, as a Member of the United States Senate. Senator BARBOUR was appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Senator Morrow, who had been elected to the Senate in 1930 for a term of 6 years, beginning March 4, 1931. Congress did not convene until December and, therefore, Senator Morrow did not take the oath of office. Senator Morrow died before the convening of the Senate and Senator BARBOUR was appointed to fill the vacancy.

The question raised by Senator PITTMAN'S resolution was whether a person elected United States Senator became a Senator at the time his term began or whether he must take the oath of office before he became a United States Senator.

Senator BARBOUR was sworn in without objection and the resolution was referred to the Judiciary Committee. So far as we know, no action was taken by the Judiciary Committee upon the resolution.

Senator PITTMAN'S speech upon the subject is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Dcember 8, 1931, beginning at page 16. Subsequently, on June 16, 1932, Senator PITTMAN filed a brief upon this subject.

The seating of Mr. HOLT decides that question. It definitely decides that it is necessary to take the required oath before any person can become a Senator of the United States. Senator PITTman raised the question in order to have it definitely decided by the Senate that such oath was not necessary and thus overrule certain court decisions which might appear to be in conflict with the practice and precedents of the Senate.

A very pertinent inquiry to be made relates to the question of the beginning of the salary of a Senator. On March 3, 1883, by an act of Congress the following provision was made:

"That Senators elected, whose term of office begins on the 4th day of March and whose credentials in due form of law shall have been presented in the Senate, but who have had no opportunity to be qualified, may receive their compensation monthly, from the beginning of their term, until there shall be a session of the Senate.

After the twentieth amendment to the Constitution became effective a new law was passed on June 19, 1934, providing that—

"Senators elected, whose term of office begins on the 3d day of January and whose credentials in due form of law shall have been presented in the Senate, may receive their compensation monthly from the beginning of their term."

These statutes clearly mean that a person elected to the Senate becomes a Senator at the beginning of his term, otherwise he would not be entitled to the salary of a Senator. The filing of the credentials is prima facie evidence of his election as well as his qualifications. Both the election and qualification for the office may be a subject of inquiry by the Senate. Until the Senate takes some affirmative action declaring that the person presenting the credentials was not legally elected, or did not meet the constitutional requirements as to age, etc., such person, so far as the records show, is a Member of the United States Senate. He, of course, can take no part in the Senate proceedings until he takes the oath required of a Senator. If he is not qualified at the beginning of his term a vacancy exists from that moment, although the Senate may not determine the fact until some later date.

In the case of Mr. HOLT, the credentials were filed. Such credentials appear on their face to be regular. Therefore, Mr. HOLT was under this law placed upon the pay roll.

The statute of the precedents have thus been followed. The question is brought to the Senate for the first time when Mr. HOLT presents himself and offers to take the oath of office. If the Senate decides, as it must decide, that he was not qualified until June 19, it must also decide that the statute under which he has drawn his salary for a period of more than 5 months is void, and that every Senator who has drawn any pay between the time his term began and the time he was sworn in has received money to which he was not entitled.

These statutes and the universal practice followed constitute precedents against any such contention, and amount to a construction of the Constitution against the seating of Mr. HOLT.

Many illustrations could be given to show how embarrassing it will be in the future if we shall decide that a person elected to the office of United States Senator does not become a United States Senator until he or she takes the oath of office. For instance, does a Senator have to take the oath of office before the immunity from arrest provided for in the Constitution attaches to him? Can a United States Senator successfully urge as a defense in a criminal prosecution that he has not yet taken the oath of office? The Constitution distinctly provides in article I, section 6, that Members of Congress shall "be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same."

There is another question, although not constitutional in character, that is so well settled in the practice of the Senate, that it would undoubtedly be necessary to adopt a resolution to change it, and that is the question of continued service which constitutes seniority.

Assuming that a Senator has been in the Senate for two or three terms, or for a period of 12 or 18 years, is reelected to the Senate and for some good reason cannot be present on the first day of the session. The adoption of the rule that a Senator's term begins when he takes the oath of office would interrupt that Senator's term of service, and the result would be that the man who takes the last oath thereby becomes the junior Senator of the Senate. This, of course, is not sufficient reason for refusing to seat a person as a Senator who ought to be seated, but we call attention to it merely for the purpose of emphasizing the well-established rule that a person becomes a Senator when his term begins. This amounts to a practical construction of the Constitution over a period of many years.

We dissent from the majority opinion that the prohibitory clause 3 of section 3 of article I of the Constitution—

"No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years, * * *"— applies to a date later than January 3, 1935, in this case, because such application does in this case permit and would set a precedent permitting a Senator-elect to determine a date on which his term begins different from that provided in the twentieth amendment:

"* * * the terms of Senators * * * (end) at noon on the 3d day of January of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin."

A Senator-elect may not determine the beginning of his term. The only choice left to him is whether he accepts or rejects the office at the beginning of the term for which he was elected.

A Senator-elect may not at will change the composition of the Senate.

The composition of the Senate is indestructible.

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for 6 years * * *."

Article V made this provision not amendable in the usual way.

The composition of the Senate could be changed only by formal acts, viz:

First, the formal consent of the State to be deprived of its equal suffrage (no such indirect and implied consent as claimed in this case);

Second, the deliberate consideration and action by the Congress, ratified by the legislatures or by the conventions of three-fourths of the several States.

It was claimed in the hearings (p. 19):

"Can anyone doubt but that the State of West Virginia did give such consent in the general election held last November by the very powerful and sovereign expression of the State, the will of the people?"

We doubt.

The evidence showed that cases were referred to during the election on the basis of which the candidate claimed that he would be entitled to be and would be admitted to his seat. His election on such claims was not consent that West Virginia should be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate for even 1 day.

The consent referred to in article V relates to amendment of the Constitution; it does not relate to a violation of the Constitution or a deviation from the Constitution.

To permit this Senator-elect to postpone, for any time, the taking of the oath and his seat, amounts to a change in the composition of the Senate in conflict with the express requirements of the Constitution.

He could not lawfully postpone it.

The time when we must apply the test is the beginning of his term.

The high privilege and duty is given to the Senate to determine the qualifications of those persons presenting themselves as Members of the Senate. There is no review of our action. The responsibility of passing upon the subject, and the sole responsibility of passing upon it, is ours. If the question we had to pass upon was one of disputed facts, we might disagree upon the facts, and, therefore, set no dangerous precedent, but here the important fact is admitted by the person presenting himself.

We do not overlook the importance of this decision. It is a serious thing to refuse to seat a person who has been duly elected as United States Senator, and who is admittedly qualified to be a Senator when he presents himself to take the oath of office, but this, after all, is nothing like as serious as disregarding the plain words of the Constitution and the precedents of the Senate throughout its existence.

For the reasons above set forth we think this resolution which we offer ought to be agreed to.

LESTER J. DICKINSON.

INDIVIDUAL VIEWS OF MR. JOHNSON

The facts in the case, admitted as they are, leave for determination a single legal or constitutional question. Mr. HOLT was a candidate for United States Senator in the primary and the election held in West Virginia in 1934. He was successful. He received from the Governor of the State the requisite certificate of election. He was elected for a term of 6 years, commencing January 3, 1935. Neither at the time of the election nor when his term commenced did he possess the age qualification provided for by the Constitution. On the 19th day of June 1935 he will have become 30 years of age, and at that time he seeks to be sworn in as a United States Senator, and this right by the majority of this committee is sought to be accorded him. Admittedly, Mr. HOLT did not ask to be sworn in as a Senator at the beginning of his term, nor has any effort been made since the commencement of his term to have him sworn in as a United States Senator.

Of course, my predilections, in common with those of my fellows, are all in favor of the duly elected representative of West Virginia. It was my hope that a fair reason might readily be found for the seating of Mr. HOLT and thus affirm the choice of the people of the State. Very reluctantly, I have been compelled to reach a conclusion other than I preferred, and this conclusion is dictated solely by the inexorable logic of the situation and what I construe to be the plain intent of the Constitution.

The limits of time pressing upon all of us now in the Senate, and the multifarious duties which demand our every waking hour, make it quite impossible adequately to discuss such a question as is presented by the present case. What we do, however, here may serve as a precedent in the future, and a decent regard for our colleagues and for those who may follow us requires that in some brief and even imperfect fashion the reasons which actuate us in our conclusions be set forth and preserved.

In two ways the Holt case may be approached: As a case of first impression and in the light of existing precedents.

1. A case of first impression: Section 3 of article I of the Constitution provides as follows:

"No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained the age of 30 years and been 9 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not when elected be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen."

The original first paragraph of section 3 provided:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof for 6 years, and each Senator shall have 1 vote."

Constitutional amendment 17 changed the phraseology of this portion of section 3 by providing for the popular election of senators but retained the first sentence thereof, "that the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected for 6 years."

The seventeenth amendment as well provided for the filling of vacancies in the office of United States Senator.

It would serve no useful purpose to detail here the long and interesting contest among the framers of the Constitution over the representation of the States in the Senate. Suffice it to say the inflexible purpose of those who finally prevailed was the protection of the smaller and less populous States against those then of existing power, or that prominence or power which might in the future arise in the States more favorably situated or more likely to increase in wealth or influence. The smaller States prevailed after a prolonged and bitter contest, which at one time threatened to disrupt the deliberations of the convention. It was then conceded and has since been, of course, unquestioned, that each State is entitled to its two Senators, who are selected for a period of 6 years. I cannot quite agree with some of my brethren who assert so vigorously that whether a State has one or two Senators concerns only that State. I feel that with the dual system prevailing there is a dual responsibility as well, and that membership in the United States Senate is a concern not only of the State, but is a concern of the Nation, too.

The Constitution makes certain requirements for membership in the Senate:

"(1) No person shall be a Senator who has not attained the age of 30 years.

"(2) No person shall be a Senator who has not been 9 years a citizen of the United States.

"(3) No person shall be a Senator who, when elected, is not an inhabitant of the State for which he has been chosen."

When the term of office of Mr. HOLT began, recognizing the constitutional limitations, he did not seek to be sworn in as a Senator, and the Senate could not have admitted him then without a plain violation, not only of the oath of Senators but of the terms of the Constitution itself. It is asserted that he can wait 5½ months and then become a Senator, qualifying under the Constitution. It is perfectly obvious, and indeed this is the claim of his sponsors, that if he can wait 5½ months, he can wait 5½ years.

It is equally plain that if he can wait 5 years until his qualification as to age shall have been removed by the lapse of time, he could, if failing in the requirement as to citizenship, wait any period of time within 6 years, and then be qualified under the Constitution.

I am unable to give any such construction to the very plain language, requiring no construction at all, of the section which I have quoted. When the session opened in January last, and Mr. HOLT conceded by what was done, his lack of qualifications, there was a vacancy in the office for which he had been elected and that vacancy, in my opinion, could not be filled merely by the passing of months or years. His election, like that of any other ineligible and disqualified candidate, was void.

If this determination be justified, I grant it is most unfortunate and I readily confess it is one that I reach with the utmost regret. But with a plain constitutional provision before us, with the facts admitted, it seems impossible in the light of our responsibility to evade it.

During the election last year Mr. HOLT was thoroughly familiar with his lack of qualifications under the Constitution and it is quite to his credit he made no attempt to conceal that fact from the people of the State. He labored under the erroneous impression, however, that because Henry Clay had sat unchallenged in the Senate under the age of 30 years, a precedent had been established in that regard. The fact, however, that Henry Clay's age apparently was unknown at the time and the question of his qualifications and eligibility never was raised could hardly afford a precedent either persuasive or controlling. What my brethren seek, who have decided otherwise in this case, is, in my opinion, by a short cut to amend the Constitution.

I have no objection whatsoever to the amendment of the Constitution of the United States, but the mode of that amendment is prescribed, and neither by legislative nor senatorial dictum should the endeavor be made permanently to alter the plain import of the Constitution's provisions. I am unable to escape the conclusion, that reading the Constitution as a whole and discerning the intent of its framers, that the design was at least at the beginning of a Senator's term he should have attained the age of 30 years. I cannot read into the Constitution the purpose of its framers to be that a Senator should have attained the age of 30 years sometime within the 6 years of his term. I cannot conceive that the other provision, which is a part of the same clause relating to citizenship, means that anyone not a citizen for the requisite period may be elected a Senator and may qualify any time after the commencement of his term, 1 year or 5 years and 11 months, may simply wait until he becomes 9 years a citizen of the United States and thus become a member of the body. It is exactly these things which the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections say in effect the constitutional requirement implies, and this anomalous situation I cannot concede.

THE SENATE PRECEDENTS

There are two Senate precedents that stand out like beacon lights, one of them established by some of the very men who wrote the Constitution; and the other coming from those whom all revere as among the greatest Americans of the last century.

The first case was that of Albert Gallatin, whose name is written large in the events just succeeding the revolution. In February 1793 Mr. Gallatin was elected a Senator from Pennsylvania and took his seat. The question of his citizenship arose, and it was insisted that he had not been a citizen of the United States for the time required by the Constitution. His citizenship had continued for a period of about 8 years. Mr. Gallatin's election, because he had not been a citizen for the time prescribed by the Constitution, was declared by the Senate void.

In this instance, it would seem that the very men most familiar with the Constitution, some of whom were really a part of it, constructed the provision in question here and reached their very definite conclusion. It might not have been difficult then in determining the eligibility or the qualifications of such a distinguished character as Mr. Gallatin to have suggested the postponement for a year or the fraction of a year which was required to qualify him in the length of time for his citizenship, but apparently no such endeavor was made and the plain language of the Constitution obviously was held to mean exactly what it said and the election consequently was decided void.

The second case which has occurred in the Senate, and which concerned one very well known and of great popularity, was that of General Shields. It is respectfully submitted that this precedent must be overturned and the views expressed by the great Senators of that day set at naught, if the majority report here shall be upheld. General Shields was elected to the Senate for the term of 6 years from March 3, 1849. On March 6 the oath of office was administered to him and his credentials were referred to a special committee of the Senate. It appeared from the committee report that General Shields was naturalized on the 21st day of October 1840, and therefore a full term of citizenship required by the Constitution he lacked by about 7 months.

The committee appointed by the Senate reported a resolution as follows:

"That the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States for the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States."

The action of the Senate as finally taken was by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the election of James Shields to be a Senator of the United States was void, he not having been a citizen of the United States for the term of years required as a qualification to be a Senator of the United States at the commencement of the term for which he was elected."

During the discussion of the case the suggestion was made that it be postponed until the following December, when by the lapse of time the disqualification under which Mr. Shields was laboring would be removed. The Senate dissented, and the debate which occurred upon the suggestion made by Senator Foote, of Mississippi, is illuminating so far as this case is concerned.

I insert the excerpts which I have verified of the debate which occurred generally upon the question involved and upon the suggestion of postponement, which seem to me conclusive of the present situation:

It appears that Senator Foote, of Mississippi, out of respect for General Shields, moved a hearing of the question be postponed until the following December, at which time General Shields would have been a citizen for 9 years, and been reelected by the legislature. To this Mr. Butler, of South Carolina, replied:

"I understand the motion to be to postpone the further consideration of this subject until the first Monday in December next. If, by the postponement of the question, the gentleman claiming a seat here as one of the Senators for the State of Illinois could then take his seat as such Senator, I would certainly vote for the motion. But this is a matter that is not without its difficulties * * *."

Mr. Butler firmly dissented from the report of the committee because, as it stood, it seemed to make the date of election determinative of disqualification, and further stated:

"But if it can be shown that in December next, when Congress shall again meet, General Shields can take his seat, I shall vote for the postponement. If he cannot then take his seat, then the postponement would be entirely unavailing; it would be protracting the matter to no purpose to adopt the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, or so it seems to me. I dissent, then so far as I am concerned, from the report of the committee, and I do so by virtue of precedents in my own State and the case of Mr. Gallatin. * * *."

To this Mr. Foote replied:

"Will the Senator allow me to ask whether he believes if the subject should be postponed until the first Monday in December, General Shields will then be entitled to take his seat?"

To which Mr. Butler replied:

"My judgment on the subject is, that if General Shields had not taken his seat at all, perhaps at that time he might have claimed it; * * *.

"I do not say that I have any opinion upon the subject one way or the other as to whether under the circumstances he will then be entitled to take his seat; but I am fully of opinion that there is no absolute necessity for eligibility to exist at the time of the election."

And again:

"I merely wish to support the constitutional view of the question. If I thought he could not constitutionally take his seat, and that it must be considered vacant, I should be bound to vote for the resolution reported by the committee; * * *."

Mr. Berrien, of Georgia:

"* * * Sir, I cannot entertain a doubt myself of the correctness of the report of the committee. I cannot conceive that the Legislature of Illinois exercises the power conferred upon it by the Constitution of the United States when that legislature elects one who is ineligible; and I cannot reconcile to myself the idea that, since by the Constitution the term of office is limited to 6 years, that term of office may be made to commence at a time posterior to the time when the individual is elected. * * * It will be, therefore, impracticable, in my judgment, for the Legislature of Illinois, when they meet again, to proceed to nullify their own act by electing a Senator again to fill the same office. Until the election be declared void, there is nothing upon which they can act * * *."

Mr. Webster:

"* * * He (General Shields) must prove that he has been a citizen of the United States for 9 years, in my judgment, on the 4th day of March. * * *

"Why, it appears to me to be plain as a turnpike road. The State of Illinois has sent a gentleman here as her Senator, upon whose qualifications it has been our duty to pass at large; and when it is stated, as a compliment and mark of respect to the honorable Senator, that no remonstrance has come here from the State of Illinois, I agree to it all; but, sir, if every citizen of Illinois were here today in his own proper person, and desired the confirmation of the Senator's claim, since the matter has been brought to our notice, and since it is before us, we must decide it according to the Constitution and our oaths. * * * Sir, our duty to the State of Illinois is to decide this question in a reasonable time, that she may have her own reasonable time to fill the vacancy. She has the right to expect it at our hands. I hope we shall follow it out at once. We should remember the responsible part we are performing in the discharge of high functions. If we are of opinion that the gentleman sent here is not eligible, we should say so, and signify that to the State that sent him here. I shall, therefore, vote against postponement * * *."

Mr. Hale said:

"* * * But until such an avowal shall be made by General Shields or somebody for him, that he does expect to alter the state of the facts, it is the duty of the Senate to vote upon it. Permit me to say, sir, that I respect that provision (sec. 3, art. I) more than anyone in it, for when I looked at the Constitution and the history of the country for the past few years, I find very few provisions of the Constitution over which the party in power has not trampled rough-shod. This, sir, is a green spot on which the heel of the party has not trod, and I desire to preserve it. I appeal to the Senate, too, to guard and preserve it.

Mr. Calhoun, of South Carolina:

"I hold that nothing is more certain than that if General Shields is not now a Senator of the United States, he never can become such by postponement. The Constitution is explicit in requiring that no person shall be a Senator unless he has been 9 years a citizen of the United States. If, then, he is not a Senator now, there is a vacancy, for Illinois would have put one vote here, and that vacancy must be filled according to law. That he is not a Senator is clear, because he cannot perform one duty belonging to the senatorial office unless he has been naturalized 9 years previous to the commencement of his senatorial term. Thinking thus, I deem it due to the State of Illinois that the question should be now settled, unless General Shields shall allege that he has evidence which will in all probability be satisfactory to the Senate that the term of 9 years had expired before the 4th of March. If such an allegation shall be made by General Shields, it will be the duty of the Senate to postpone it, but not otherwise. * * *

"And now, sir, I come to a point of some little importance, and it is, that the question here involved should be clearly settled, not only for the present, but for all future time. My opinion is, that the resolution is not entirely correct. It would seem to conclude that all kinds of elections are void unless 9 years shall have expired on the day of election. I think that is not according to the Constitution. My opinion is, that if the 9 years are consummated previous to the 4th day of March, the election is good, and is not void. I propose, therefore, to add to the resolution the following words: 'At the commencement of the term for which he was elected.'"

Mr. Webster:

"Is it not obvious, that if the Executive appointment occur in the recess, a question must arise as to whether there was a vacancy, and what sort of a vacancy? If a man has no seat, how can he resign his seat? If the election was void, a vacancy cannot be created by resignation—there is a vacancy already. Then I suggest to Senators—those who say that the question is so clear—that, however it may now be decided by the Senate, the question must hereafter be whether there was a vacaney when the 'resignation', so-called, was made."

Mr. Douglas (colleague of General Shields):

"The proposition is, that the election was void. I maintain that under the Constitution you have no right to declare it void; that is, upon the question which is still pending before you, you have no right to say that the election was void. It may have been voidable * * *."

Mr. Barrien:

"We are simply engaged in performing a duty which as Senators we owe to the Constitution of the United States; and it seems to me that we manifest the most perfect respect for the State of Illinois by vindicating the principles of the Constitution, which she, in common with the other States of the Union, have ordained for the government of this people. Now, it seems to me that the indications are very clear that it is the opinion of a majority of this Senate that this election was absolutely void at the time when it was made, if for no other reason, because the individual elected was not qualified to take his seat on the 4th day of March last—on the day when, by the Constitution, his senatorial term was to commence. Taking this to be the conviction of the Senate, I ask if any action of this body can change the consequences which must result? The Senator from Illinois seeks to discharge a duty which he owes to his State. Sir, we all owe a like duty to the State of Illinois, and to every other State in the Union. But he mistakes, in my opinion, if he supposes that any action of this Senate, either by passing or by refusing to pass the resolution, can affect the right of the State of Illinois or the manner in which that right shall be exercised by the constituted authorities in electing a Senator.

The question proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is perfectly unanswerable. If this election was void, the office has never been filled since the expiration of the last senatorial term. The vacancy which has preexisted the adjournment of Congress must continue to exist, because it depends upon the interpretation of the Constitution, and is wholly independent of any action of ours. The governor cannot appoint, nor can we, by our action, enable him to appoint. The election is for 6 years, as shown by the credentials of the Senator, and to enable the State of Illinois to be represented in an extra session, which the President may deem it necessary to call, the Senator must be qualified to take his seat at any time after the expiration of his predecessor's time. The term of the predecessor of the Senator from Illinois having expired on the 3d day of March, unless the Constitution contemplated that the State should be unrepresented, the succeeding term must commence on the next day. And it is necessary that he should be qualified to take his seat, according to the express terms of his credentials, as a Senator of the United States for 6 years from the 4th day of March. This is the testimony in the present case. And now, if this gentleman was not qualified to discharge the duty of Senator on the 4th day of March, is it possible that any action of ours can change the existing state of facts? If he is not qualified on that day, the office is rendered vacant by the expiration of the term of his predecessor, and is not affected by any action of ours. No action of ours can change the state of facts arising from the application of the principles of the Constitution. I desire, sir, to say that in the course which I pursue on this occasion, I am merely fulfilling what I conceive to be a constitutional duty, not contending for the privileges of the Senate, certainly not desirous of manifesting any disrespect to the State of Illinois, or to her Senator, but on the contrary, believing that that State has as much interest as any other in the enforcement of the principles of the Constitution.

Mr. Butler:

"I maintained yesterday, and still maintain, that although General Shields was not eligible at the time of his election, yet if he could have taken his seat on the 4th day of March with his qualifications complete, his previous ineligibility would not vitiate his election. But, inasmuch as it is represented that he could not at the time of taking his seat show that his qualifications were complete, I must be permitted to say that I am clearly of opinion that it cannot be maintained that he ever had valid title to his seat at all. The question resolves itself to this: Did his election confer upon him a valid title to the seat on the 4th of March? If it did not, it is not a title at all. You may qualify it by calling the election voidable, or void, if you please. He had prima facie evidence of title to the seat in the credentials which were presented. But the moment it was ascertained that the title conferred upon him no right at all to take his seat here on the 4th of March, you cannot say that any title had been conferred upon him at all. * * *

"But it is represented here that General Shields, having no title to his seat, must go back for reelection or appointment by the Governor, and that it is the duty of this body to throw no obstacle in the way, but to act in such a manner as to render this practicable. Sir, we cannot construe the Constitution of the United States for the accommodation of individuals. That is out of the question. My own inclinations are in favor of the sitting member. I concur in the opinion that it is due to the State of Illinois that this question should be settled. I know it has been stated that General Shields has offered to resign. But if there is nothing which he can resign, the act would be a nullity. To determine this, we must go back to the distinct inquiry as to whether the election conveyed a valid title at the time when he was called upon to discharge the duties of the office. If the election never has been valid, I presume it will be admitted that the Governor cannot fill the vacancy, and the sooner the facts are ascertained the better, in order to enable the Governor of Illinois to take measures to have the State represented by Senators upon this floor. I shall be much mistaken if, after the matter shall have been fully discussed, these gentlemen who have argued thus with much pertinacity will not be compelled to yield up their judgment. * * *"

Mr. Underwood:

"Now, let us reason about this matter: Let us look at the Constitution. The Constitution says that unless an individual has been 9 years a citizens of the United States he cannot be a Senator of the United States. And that is not the only prohibition * * * (it says that unless he be of the age of 30 years he shall not be a Senator). Suppose, then, you elect a man who is under 30 years of age, is not the election void?"

In the course of the general argument upon the principle involved and the fundamental constitutional question, Mr. Webster said:

* * * "I hold, most unquestionably, that the election was void, because the person upon whom the election fell was not competent to discharge the functions of the office that are intended to be conferred upon him; that is to say, to be a Senator from the 3d of March 1849 for 6 years. Now, if he could not be a Senator from the 3d of March for 6 years, then he was not eligible for the senatorial term, and it might just as well be said that he might be elected when he had been a citizen 6 years, and await the lapse of 3 years before commencing his period of service, as it may be said that he may be elected and await the lapse of 9 months. The proposition is so clear that I think a little reflection will satisfy every gentleman on the subject."

In the course of the general debate as well, Mr. Seward said:

"* * * The qualification of naturalization for a period of 9 years is a qualification which is not required at the time of election, but a qualification which must exist at the commencement of his term of service. * * * I agree with the Senator from Missouri that this case is not to be changed, unless it be by presenting evidence to show to the Senate, at its meeting in December, that the Honorable James Shields had been naturalized 9 years prior to the 4th of March."

I submit that the arguments with the reasons so clearly stated for the Senate's final action in the Shields case cannot in this instance be lightly disregarded. We have the power, of course, to decide otherwise; but at least a contrary decision, overruling that of Senators like those named above, should be upon reasons as cogent and arguments as compelling.

The State reports are replete with cases relating to eligibility and qualifications for office. A large number hold that the time when the lack of eligibility or qualifications would attach is the election; while a larger number hold the crucial date is that of the commencement of the term of office. I see no useful purpose in collating the innumerable cases, which will be found in the digests and textbooks from different jurisdictions, nor argue either the one rule or the other that may prevail.

If precedent is to govern in this case, the Gallatin case, and even more so the Shields case, are conclusive.

If construction of the Constitution shall prevail, the result which was reached in these two precedents seems not only justified but imperative.

As I have stated in the beginning of these observations, very reluctantly I am compelled to hold as I have indicated. With equal reluctance I present this report, which is not as full or complete as I would wish, but which in establishing a precedent for future years, I feel upon my responsibility as a Senator should be put before my brethren.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, reported a resolution (S. Res. 155), which was read and ordered to be placed on the calendar, as follows:

Resolved, That RUSH D. HOLT is entitled to his seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of West Virginia; it appearing that he was 30 years of age at the time when he presented himself to the Senate to take the oath and to assume the duties of the office.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

TAX METHODS AND POLICIES (H. DOC. NO. 229)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

As the fiscal year draws to its close it becomes our duty to consider the broad question of tax methods and policies. I wish to acknowledge the timely efforts of the Congress to lay the basis through its committees for administrative improvements, by careful study of the revenue systems of our own and of other countries. These studies have made it very clear that we need to simplify and clarify our revenue laws.

The Joint Legislative Committee, established by the Revenue Act of 1926, has been particularly helpful to the Treasury Department. The members of that committee have generously consulted with administrative officials, not only on broad questions of policy but on important and difficult tax cases.

On the basis of these studies and of other studies conducted by officials of the Treasury, I am able to make a number of suggestions of important changes in our policy of taxation. These are based on the broad principle that if a government is to be prudent its taxes must produce ample revenues without discouraging enterprise; and if it is to be just it must distribute the burden of taxes equitably. I do not believe that our present system of taxation completely meets this test. Our revenue laws have operated in many ways to the unfair advantage of the few, and they have done little to prevent an unjust concentration of wealth and economic power.

With the enactment of the income-tax law of 1913 the Federal Government began to apply effectively the widely accepted principle that taxes should be levied in proportion to ability to pay and in proportion to the benefits received. Income was wisely chosen as the measure of benefits and of ability to pay. This was and still is a wholesome guide for national policy. It should be retained as the governing principle of Federal taxation. The use of other forms of taxes is often justifiable, particularly for temporary periods; but taxation according to income is the most effective instrument yet devised to obtain just contribution from those best able to bear it and to avoid placing onerous burdens upon the mass of our people.

The movement toward progressive taxation of wealth and of income has accompanied the growing diversification and interrelation of effort which marks our industrial society. Wealth in the modern world does not come merely from individual effort; it results from a combination of individual effort and of the manifold uses to which the community puts that effort. The individual does not create the product of his industry with his own hands; he utilizes the many processes and forces of mass production to meet the demands of a national and international market.

Therefore, in spite of the great importance in our national life of the efforts and ingenuity of unusual individuals, the people in the mass have inevitably helped to make large fortunes possible. Without mass cooperation great accumulations of wealth would be impossible save by unhealthy speculation. As Andrew Carnegie put it, "Where wealth accrues honorably, the people are always silent partners." Whether it be wealth achieved through the cooperation of the entire community or riches gained by speculation—in either case the ownership of such wealth or riches represents a great public interest and a great ability to pay.

I

My first proposal, in line with this broad policy, has to do with inheritances and gifts. The transmission from generation to generation of vast fortunes by will, inheritance, or gift is not consistent with the ideals and sentiments of the American people.

The desire to provide security for one's self and one's family is natural and wholesome, but it is adequately served by a reasonable inheritance. Great accumulations of wealth cannot be justified on the basis of personal and family security. In the last analysis such accumulations amount to the perpetuation of great and undesirable concentration of control in a relatively few individuals over the employment and welfare of many, many others.

Such inherited economic power is as inconsistent with the ideals of this generation as inherited political power was inconsistent with the ideals of the generation which established our Government.

Creative enterprise is not stimulated by vast inheritances. They bless neither those who bequeath nor those who receive. As long ago as 1907, in a message to Congress, President Theodore Roosevelt urged this wise social policy:

> A heavy progressive tax upon a very large fortune is in no way such a tax upon thrift or industry as a like tax would be on a small fortune. No advantage comes either to the country as a whole or to the individuals inheriting the money by permitting the transmission in their entirety of the enormous fortunes which would be affected by such a tax; and as an incident to its function of revenue raising, such a tax would help to preserve a measurable equality of opportunity for the people of the generations growing to manhood.

A tax upon inherited economic power is a tax upon static wealth, not upon that dynamic wealth which makes for the healthy diffusion of economic good.

Those who argue for the benefits secured to society by great fortunes invested in great businesses should note that such a tax does not affect the essential benefits that remain after the death of the creator of such a business. The mechanism of production that he created remains. The benefits of corporate organization remain. The advantage of pooling many investments in one enterprise remains. Governmental privileges such as patents remain. All that is gone is the initiative, energy, and genius of the creator—and death has taken these away.

I recommend, therefore, that in addition to the present estate taxes there should be levied an inheritance, succession, and legacy tax in respect to all very large amounts received by any one legatee or beneficiary; and to prevent, so far as possible, evasions of this tax, I recommend further the imposition of gift taxes suited to this end.

Because of the basis on which this proposed tax is to be levied and also because of the very sound public policy of encouraging a wider distribution of wealth, I strongly urge that the proceeds of this tax should be specifically segregated and applied, as they accrue, to the reduction of the national debt. By so doing, we shall progressively lighten the tax burden of the average taxpayer, and, incidentally, assist in our approach to a balanced Budget.

II

The disturbing effects upon our national life that come from great inheritances of wealth and power can in the future be reduced, not only through the method I have just described, but through a definite increase in the taxes now levied upon very great individual net incomes.

To illustrate: The application of the principle of a graduated tax now stops at $1,000,000 of annual income. In other words, while the rate for a man with a $6,000 income is double the rate for one with a $4,000 income, a man having a $5,000,000 annual income pays at the same rate as one whose income is $1,000,000.

Social unrest and a deepening sense of unfairness are dangers to our national life which we must minimize by rigorous methods. People know that vast personal incomes come not only through the effort or ability or luck of those who receive them, but also because of the opportunities for advantages which government itself contributes. Therefore, the duty rests upon the Government to restrict such incomes by very high taxes.

III

In the modern world scientific invention and mass production have brought many things within the reach of the average man which in an earlier age were available to few. With large-scale enterprise has come the great corporation drawing its resources from widely diversified activities and from a numerous group of investors. The community has profited in those cases in which large-scale production has resulted in substantial economies and lower prices.

The advantages and the protections conferred upon corporations by Government increase in value as the size of the corporation increases. Some of these advantages are granted by the State which conferred a charter upon the corporation, others are granted by other States which, as a matter of grace, allow the corporation to do local business within their borders. But perhaps the most important advantages, such as the carrying on of business between two or more States, are derived through the Federal Government—great corporations are protected in a considerable measure from the taxing power and the regulatory power of the States by virtue of the interstate character of their businesses. As the profit to such a corporation increases, so the value of its advantages and protections increases.

Furthermore, the drain of a depression upon the reserves of business puts a disproportionate strain upon the modestly capitalized small enterprise. Without such small enterprises our competitive economic society would cease. Size begets monopoly. Moreover, in the aggregate these little businesses furnish the indispensable local basis for those Nation-wide markets which alone can insure the success of our mass-production industries. Today our smaller corporations are fighting not only for their own local well-being but for that fairly distributed national prosperity which makes large-scale enterprise possible.

It seems only equitable, therefore, to adjust our tax system in accordance with economic capacity advantage and fact. The smaller corporations should not carry burdens beyond their powers; the vast concentrations of capital should be ready to carry burdens commensurate with their powers and their advantages.

We have established the principle of graduated taxation in respect to personal incomes, gifts, and estates. We should apply the same principle to corporations. Today the smallest corporation pays the same rate on its net profits as the corporation which is a thousand times its size.

I, therefore, recommend the substitution of a corporation income tax graduated according to the size of corporation income in place of the present uniform corporation income tax of 13¾ percent. The rate for smaller corporations might well be reduced to 10¾ percent, and the rates graduated upward to a rate of 16¾ percent on net income in the case of the largest corporations, with such classifications of business enterprises as the public interest may suggest to the Congress.

Provisions should, of course, be made to prevent evasion of such graduated tax on corporate incomes through the device of numerous subsidiaries or affiliates, each of which might technically qualify as a small concern even though all were in fact operated as a single organization. The most effective method of preventing such evasions would be a tax on dividends received by corporations. Bona fide investment trusts that submit to public regulation and perform the function of permitting small investors to obtain the benefit of diversification of risk may well be exempted from this tax.

In addition to these three specific recommendations of changes in our national tax policies, I commend to your study and consideration a number of others. Ultimately we should seek through taxation the simplification of our corporate structures through the elimination of unnecessary holding companies in all lines of business. We should likewise discourage unwieldy and unnecessary corporate surpluses. These complicated and difficult questions cannot adequately be debated in the time remaining in the present session of this Congress.

I renew, however, at this time the recommendations made by my predecessors for the submission and ratification of a Constitutional Amendment whereby the Federal Government will be permitted to tax the income on subsequently issued State and local securities and likewise for the taxation by State and local governments of future issues of Federal securities.

In my Budget message of January 7 I recommended that the Congress extend the miscellaneous Internal Revenue taxes which are about to expire and also to maintain the current rates of those taxes which, under the present law, would be reduced. I said then that I considered such taxes necessary to the financing of the Budget for 1936. I am gratified that the Congress is taking action on this recommendation.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 19, 1935.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, before the President's message is referred to the Committee on Finance, I wish to make one comment. I just wish to say "Amen!"

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). The President's message will be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

CHANGE OF NAME OF DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

Mr. LEWIS obtained the floor.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. There is pending before the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments Senate bill 2665, to change the name of the Department of the Interior and to coordinate certain governmental functions. The bill relates to the creation of a new department to be known as the "Department of Conservation and Works." I think the Senator from Illinois is interested in the bill. I wish he would explain the bill at this time.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the bill referred to by the Senator from New Mexico is the bill which provides for changing the name of the Department of the Interior and likewise merges into one unit certain other lesser governmental agencies. The bill was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, of which I have the honor to be chairman. Upon investigation, the members of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys feel that the subject matter properly belongs to that committee. Members of the committee having to do with mining feel that the subject touches mining.

I answer the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] that it is my judgment also that this measure, though it has already received some consideration, should properly go to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. I have so expressed myself to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. President, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. I wish to state that the Secretary of the Interior likewise consents to the transfer of the bill concerning which I have made mention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that the bill also involves subjects under the Department of Agriculture; and when the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys gets through with the bill I think it should go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Therefore I request that it then be referred for consideration to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would not be in order at the present time. There being no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

PERSHING HALL, PARIS, FRANCE

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 933, being Senate bill 2917. The subject matter of the legislation is affected with some degree of emergency. There exists a recreation fund in the amount of $776,000. Of this fund about $482,000 is composed of what is known as the "Stars and Stripes fund." This fund was created during the World War. A news publication was issued, circulated, and sold on the battle front with the result that the fund referred to was created. It has been held in trust as a part of the recreation fund of the Army for the benefit of veterans of the World War.

There is in Paris a building formerly known as the "American Legion Building", now known as "Pershing Hall." Its construction was authorized in the American Legion Convention of 1927. Due to the depression and other circumstances the organizations which originally fostered the building have been unable to pay the amounts due as they matured. Therefore the legislation has been proposed, the bill being introduced by the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SHEPPARD]. It contemplates the use of a portion of the recreation fund for the purpose of paying off the indebtedness on Pershing Hall. An amendment will be offered, I understand, by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] to make certain that the title to the property shall be vested in the Government. After the Government acquires the property it can then be determined what final disposition or use may be made of it. The provision of the bill is that it shall be used for the benefit of veterans of the World War.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask if the bill is on the Senate Calendar?

Mr. ROBINSON. It is; and it was unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McNARY. Has the bill been considered by the House?

Mr. ROBINSON. So far as I know, it has not been considered by the House of Representatives. It will be necessary, or at least highly desirable, to secure final action on the measure before the 1st day of July, because at that time, under the provisions of the War Department Appropriation Act of 1933, the recreation fund will pass into the General Treasury, and an appropriation would then become necessary in order to make funds available for this or for any other purpose.

Mr. McNARY. In view of the statement of the Senator from Arkansas, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2917) authorizing an appropriation to the American Legion for its use in effecting a settlement of the remainder due on, and the reorganization of, Pershing Hall, a memorial already erected in Paris, France, to the commander in chief, officers, and men of the expeditionary forces, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That $482,032.92 of the fund entitled "Recreation fund—Army", created by the War Department Appropriation Act, approved March 4, 1933, is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the American Legion, incorporated by act of Congress September 16, 1919, for use by and at the discretion and under the direction of the American Legion, Inc., for effecting a settlement of any indebtedness connected with and the reorganization of Pershing Hall, a memorial already erected in Paris, France, to the commander in chief, officers, men, and auxiliary services of the American Expeditionary forces, to the end that such memorial as so freed from debt and reorganized may be perpetuated. Any balance not required for settling such indebtedness shall be available for expenditure by and under the direction of the American Legion, Inc., for the maintenance and/or to secure the perpetuation of such Pershing Hall.

SEC. 2. An itemized report shall be transmitted to the Senate and House of Representatives on the first day of each regular session of Congress of expenditures made in pursuance herewith.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, in order to place the payment of the fund in the hands of the Treasury and to make sure that title to the building shall be vested in the United States Government before the payment shall be made, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment, in section 1, page 2, line 9, after the word "appropriated", it is proposed to strike out the words "to the American Legion, incorporated by act of Congress September 16, 1919, for use by and at the discretion and under the direction of the American Legion, Inc."; in line 12, after the word "settlement", to insert the words "by the Secretary of the Treasury"; and in line 18, after the word "perpetuated", to strike out the period and insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided, That the amount herein provided shall not be used for the purposes indicated herein until the legal title to said property shall have been vested in the Government of the United States for the use and benefit of all American officers and enlisted men of the World War", so as to make the section read:

That $482,032.92 of the fund entitled "Recreation fund—Army", created by the War Department Appropriation Act, approved March 4, 1933, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for effecting a settlement by the Secretary of the Treasury of any indebtedness connected with and the reorganization of Pershing Hall, a memorial already erected in Paris, France, to the commander in chief, officers, men, and auxiliary services of the American expeditionary forces, to the end that such memorial as so freed from debt and reorganized may be perpetuated: Provided, That the amount herein provided shall not be used for the purposes indicated herein until the legal title to said property shall have been vested in the Government of the United States for the use and benefit of all American officers and enlisted men of the World War. Any balance not required for settling such indebtedness shall be available for expenditure by and under the direction of the American Legion, Inc., for the maintenance and/or to secure the perpetuation of such Pershing Hall.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD, in connection with the proceedings on the bill, the report by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] relating to the bill.

There being no objection, the report (no. 887) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2917) authorizing an appropriation to the American Legion for its use in effecting a settlement of the remainder due on and the reorganization of Pershing Hall, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that it do pass amended as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That $482,032.92 of the fund entitled 'Recreation fund—Army', created by the War Department Appropriation Act, approved March 4, 1933, is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the American Legion, incorporated by act of Congress September 16, 1919, for use by and at the discretion and under the direction of the American Legion, Inc., for effecting a settlement of any indebtedness connected with and the reorganization of Pershing Hall, a memorial already erected in Paris, France, to the commander in chief, officers, men, and auxiliary services of the American expeditionary Forces, to the end that such memorial as so freed from debt and reorganized may be perpetuated. Any balance not required for settling such indebtedness shall be available for expenditure by and under the direction of the American Legion, Inc., for the maintenance and/or to secure the perpetuation of such Pershing Hall.

"SEC. 2. An itemized report shall be transmitted to the Senate and House of Representatives on the first day of each regular session of Congress of expenditures made in pursuance herewith."

In the American Legion convention in 1927, there was authorized the erection of a memorial building which in its original conception was known as the "American Legion Building." This building was later and is now named "Pershing Hall." The building was erected at a total cost of approximately $540,000. What seemed at the time to be a sufficient amount of money to pay for the building and provide for its maintenance was at that time and later subscribed by various organizations and by individuals. However, due to the depression of 1929, the change in rates of exchange, and various unforeseen circumstances, the actual amount finally collected toward the building was only between $540,000 and $500,000. Mortgages and liens on the building are now due and in imminent danger of foreclosure. The project is beyond the financial resources of the American Legion and no hope of help from other sources. However, there is now on deposit a trust fund accumulated from profits of the Stars and Stripes, the American newspaper published by and for the members of the American expeditionary forces. This fund amounts to $482,032.92, and under a proviso in the last War Department Act is to revert to the Treasury of the United States on July 1, 1935, with no benefit to the men who were responsible in fact for the accumulation of the fund. This bill (S. 2917) proposes to utilize this fund for the worthy purpose of disposing of the existing indebtedness on Pershing Hall and to assist in its future maintenance.

War Department report on this bill is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 13, 1936.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: Careful consideration has been given to the bill (S. 2917, 74th Cong., 1st sess.) authorizing an appropriation to the American Legion for its use in effecting a settlement of the remainder due on, and the reorganization of, Pershing Hall, a memorial already erected in Paris, France, to the commander in chief, officers, and men of the expeditionary forces, which you transmitted to the War Department under date of May 29, 1935, with a request for information and the views of the Department relative thereto.

The fund now known as the "Recreation fund—Army", was derived from the following:

(a) Other funds: These were funds accumulated by military organizations which were disbanded at the close of the World War. The War Department, as the logical trustee of these funds, made such distribution of the funds as could properly be made to successor organizations. The undistributed balance remained in the custody of an Army disbursing officer, who invested the larger portion in Liberty bonds, and kept the balance in a special deposit account in the United States Treasury.

(b) Stars and Stripes fund: This comprised the proceeds derived from the publication at the front during the World War of the periodical Stars and Stripes. The trusteeship for this fund also devolved upon the War Department, and it was in the custody of an Army disbursing officer and deposited by him in a special deposit account in the Treasury of the United States.

These funds were thus held as available for the general welfare of the enlisted men of the Army.

The above was the status of this money at the date of passage of the War Department Appropriation Act of March 4, 1933, which contained the following provision:

"Provided, That the Secretary of War shall deposit in the Treasury of the United States the unobligated balances on January 12, 1933, to the credit of the funds unobligated entitled 'Other funds' and 'Stars and Stripes', the money so deposited to be credited to a fund to be entitled 'Recreation fund—Army', and such fund shall not be subject to withdrawal except in time of war, when it shall be available for expenditure by the Secretary of War for the recreation, amusement, comfort, contentment, and health of the enlisted personnel of the Military Establishment."

The balances available and deposited pursuant to this provision of law were:

Other funds	$325,416.23
Stars and Stripes fund	482,032.92
Total	807,449.15

The "Recreation fund—Army" thus became a trust fund, available for expenditure only in time of war, and then only in the discretion of the Secretary of War "for the recreation, amusement, comfort, contentment, and health of the enlisted personnel of the Military Establishment."

By the Independent Offices Appropriation Act approved June 16, 1933, the following was provided:

"Such amount as may be necessary of the fund entitled 'Recreation fund—Army', created by the War Department Appropriation Act, approved March 4, 1933, is hereby appropriated and made available for reimbursement to the Veterans' Administration for all expenses (including transportation to bona fide residents) incurred in connection with indigent veterans in attendance at the convention of the Rank and File Organization of the World War Veterans held in Washington, D. C., during the month of May 1933, and the decision of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in connection with such expenditures shall be final and conclusive."

The records of the Treasury Department indicate that the sum of $30,563.26 was withdrawn by the Veterans' Administration pursuant to the above-quoted authority, leaving a present unexpended balance of $776,885.89 in the fund.

By section 8 of the act approved June 20, 1934, providing for the repeal of certain permanent appropriations, this fund is to be abolished, effective July 1, 1935. This section reads as follows:

"Effective July 1, 1935, the appropriation account on the books of the Government entitled 'Recreation fund—Army' (8T078), is abolished and the balance thereof shall be covered into the surplus fund of the Treasury: Provided, That an amount equal to the amount so covered into the surplus fund of the Treasury is hereby authorized to be appropriated from the general fund of the Treasury in the event of war, for the recreation, amusement, comfort, contentment, and health of the enlisted personnel of the Military Establishment."

Accordingly, in the absence of further legislation prior to the first proximo, the trust fund "Recreation fund—Army", will cease to exist. The War Department will offer no objection to the change in this policy which would be effected by the enactment of the bill herein reported on.

This proposed report has been submitted to the Acting Director of the Bureau of the Budget, who advises that it is not in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

GEO. H. DERN, Secretary of War.

In its report on S. 2917, the State Department points out that Pershing Hall is the Paris home of the American Legion, and bearing as it does the name of the General of the Armies is viewed by a large section of the French people as something in the nature of a national monument. The Department further states that in the event Pershing Hall should not be reorganized and freed from debt, it would be a serious blow to American prestige and to the financial credit in France of private American institutions.

Letter from the State Department follows:

June 13, 1935.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: I have received your letter of June 5, 1935, on behalf of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, asking for comment on S. 2917, introduced on May 13, 1935, by you, authorizing an appropriation to the American Legion for its use in effecting a settlement of the remainder due on and the reorganization of Pershing Hall.

The Department of State perceives no objection to the bill as drafted. It will be recalled that Pershing Hall is the Paris home of the American Legion, and bearing as it does the name of the General of the Armies is viewed by a large section of the French people as something in the nature of a national monument.

Without entering into the question of the financing or the organization of the hall, the Department of State can safely assert that if Pershing Hall should not be reorganized and freed from debt, it would be a serious blow to American prestige and to the financial credit in France of private American institutions.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting an international agreement and the nomination of Edward D. Bolger, of Michigan, to be United States marshal, western district of Michigan, to succeed Martin Brown, resigned, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. MCKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. TRAMMELL, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of several postmasters in the State of Florida.

He also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers in the Navy and the Marine Corps.

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably Executive N, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, being a treaty on the protection of artistic and scientific institutions and historic monuments, signed at Washington on April 15, 1935, and submitted a report (Ex. Rept. No. 11) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

ELWOOD HAMILTON—NOTIFICATION TO PRESIDENT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation on yesterday of Mr. Elwood Hamilton as judge of the United States Court for the Western District of Kentucky. The reason I make the request is that the President is leaving the city tomorrow. A vacancy exists in the judgeship, and it is important, in view of the condition of the docket, that the commission be issued as soon as possible.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understand the vacancy has existed for some time?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; that is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

The calendar is in order.

FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK BOARD—JOHN H. FAHEY

The legislative clerk read the nomination, passed over, of John H. Fahey, of Massachusetts, to be a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, inasmuch as I asked that the nomination go over I should like to make a statement outlining some of the reasons on which I predicate my objection to the confirmation of Mr. Fahey as a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

I have no reason to question Mr. Fahey's character or integrity. Senators who have known him for a number of years have assured me that he is a gentleman of the highest character. I do not attack the administration of the enormous funds which have been voted by the Congress from time to time for the purpose of relieving the distressed home owners of the country, which funds have been administered by the Board of which Mr. Fahey is the head. It is too early, of course, to apprize fully the work of the Board, and anyone who has had the command of the credit of the United States to the extent this Board has, of course, could have accomplished a great deal.

I do believe, however, from my dealings with the Board and my attempts to reach its chairman to present matters of vital concern to constituents of mine, that Mr. Fahey is wholly unsuited by temperament and disposition to hold a position of this nature in a democracy governed by principles and rules which I have always conceived to be democratic and for the welfare of the whole people.

Late in the year 1933 there was certain information which I sought from this Board relating to its operations, the number of loans it had made, the amounts loaned in the various States, the set-up, and the organization of the agencies in the various States of the Union, and so forth. I was unable to get any information whatever from the Board. After some months of time the Congress reconvened and I introduced a resolution calling for the information, and after the adoption of the resolution the information was finally furnished.

At a subsequent date I sought other information from the chairman of the Board as to the status of its business in my State. It has always been my policy, which I think is proper for any public servant, to attempt to advise with the people of my State as to the progress of various agencies of the Government in my State. It required 1 month and 6 days to secure an answer to a letter which I addressed to the chairman of the Board merely asking the simple question as to how many loans had been made in my State and the amount of money involved.

There is nothing whatever smacking of any resentment arising out of patronage matters that prompts my opposition to confirmation of the nomination. When the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offered his amendment, which would have placed on purely a merit system all appointments that were to be made by the Board in carrying on its business, I was one of the few Members on this side of the aisle who supported the amendment. I think, however, I was in error in following that distinguished Senator, for shortly thereafter incidents occurred in the Atlanta agency and in the Georgia agency of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation which led me to believe that petty politics were being played by those in charge of that office in making appointments and in discharging those who were employed there at that time.

I had not recommended the person who had a job with this agency who was discharged. He was told by the director of the State agency that he was being discharged because, in his capacity as an attorney at law, before he was appointed as one of the lawyers to prepare abstracts, he had written my office a letter and asked me to get in touch with the Home Owners' Loan Board to attempt to expedite an application for a loan which had been pending for something like 60 days.

I did not regard that as being any great crime—the mere fact that a man who formerly had represented a home owner who was seeking a loan, being then connected in the position of an abstract attorney with the State agency, should have previously written to the Senator from the State in an effort to have the matter pushed to a conclusion and to avoid the sale of the home.

When this man was discharged I took up the matter with other persons connected with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. The report came back to me that that was the truth of the matter; that the man was discharged because he had written a Senator of the United States in behalf of a client of his to secure his aid in expediting an application for a loan which was about to be foreclosed by a mortgage company or some other lien holder. The lawyer involved was not an outstanding politician, but he is an honorable, upright, conscientious attorney.

Finally, as a last resort, I endeavored, in my capacity as a Senator of the United States, to get in contact with Mr. Fahey to submit what I conceived to be a legitimate grievance, to present to him a case which, to my mind, represented a great injustice—not against any great, outstanding politician but against one of my constituents.

I personally telephoned to this gentleman's office for 3 days, and on each occasion was told that he was in the White House in conference with the President. On each occasion I asked that when he returned from his conference with the President he kindly call me, as I should like to arrange to come down to his offices and present a matter involving one of my constituents. On the fourth day my secretary was told rather abruptly that Mr. Fahey could not see me and would not see me, but that he would be very glad indeed to send or to have me come to see either his second or third assistant and for me to present the matter to him.

Mr. President, I have no illusions of greatness. I try not ever to take myself too seriously; but I believe that as one of the representatives of a great, sovereign State of the Union I should be permitted to present a matter involving one of my constituents to any department or bureau head in Washington.

The great President of the United States himself would not have denied that right to any Senator on this side of the aisle or on the other side of the aisle; and I do not think any appointee, merely because he has been permitted to bask in the smile of a great President of the United States, should wax so arrogant and so tyrannical that a Member of the Senate of the United States cannot go to him upon official business to present a matter which he regards as being possessed of merit.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the able Senator from Georgia whether he has verified, in any way satisfactory to himself, the fact that this head of a department did send a message to him as Senator, that the Senator could not confer with him, but that the Senator could confer, if he desired, with some first, second, or third of this nominee's assistants or secretaries?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will state to the Senator from Illinois that I could not reach the gentleman whose name is now pending in the Senate to have him give me any message whatever of any kind, shape, form, or character, though I personally endeavored for 3 days over the telephone to do so. Finally, on the fourth day, after having called again, I was told later in the day by my secretary that Mr. Fahey's office had called back and said that I could see either the second or third assistant; I am not sure which it was.

Mr. President, in my judgment a man occupying a position of this kind should be willing to hear the appeals of any citizen of the United States who feels that he has been dealt with unjustly. The right of petition is just as sacred a right under our form of government as freedom of conscience and freedom of speech. While I know nothing whatever about this man personally, all my efforts to meet him in person having failed, unless I had posted myself outside his place of abode and chased him down the streets supplicating an audience, I do not feel that he is showing the proper conception of his duties in this office in a democratic form of government. He undoubtedly would make a most excellent assistant to Hitler or Mussolini in any land where a dictatorship would thrive; but in a democracy, where men have a right to petition their government, I do not think a man who has shown such an utter disregard not only for the right of the representative of a sovereign State to present a grievance, but if even for the humblest citizen of that State to do so, should occupy a position of this kind.

I do not care to take up the time of the Senate. There is absolutely nothing personal in my opposition; but having passed through these experiences, and others which I might relate, I cannot in good conscience vote to confirm this appointment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, of course I know nothing of the personal official relationship between the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] and Mr. Fahey. I regret that the matter was not presented to the Committee on Banking and Currency in order that Mr. Fahey might have been heard with regard to the matters to which the Senator from Georgia has referred. I am certain, if opportunity were presented, Mr. Fahey could explain to the satisfaction of the Senator from Georgia that there was no intention upon his part to deny the Senator every attention and courtesy that should be extended to him. Without giving Mr. Fahey an opportunity to explain is unfair to him. It is unfortunate that he has not been given an opportunity to answer or explain the events related by the Senator from Georgia.

I have known Mr. Fahey for a good many years, at least 25 years. I know that he did not seek this office, and that he was not a candidate for this or any other office. I know that he accepted the office at a great personal sacrifice, and upon the urgent request of the President of the United States. Mr. Fahey has never been an officeseeker. That is foreign to his very nature.

Mr. Fahey is a successful business man. He is now the publisher of a Democratic newspaper in the second largest city of Massachusetts. He has been president of the United States Chamber of Commerce—in my opinion the most progressive and liberal president that organization ever had.

In politics, Mr. Fahey is a decided Progressive. He has not always been in sympathy or in harmony with the views of the party organization in Massachusetts as such. He has repeatedly favored, by public appearance before the legislature and through his press, liberal and progressive legislation. He has been one of the most outstanding leaders in Massachusetts in urging and demanding the lowering of the gas and electric-light rates, which attitude has not been particularly helpful to him in some quarters. He is without question the most industrious public servant I have ever met; and that, perhaps, is one of the reasons for the misunderstanding which has prompted the Senator from Georgia to entertain the views he has expressed. Mr. Fahey works from morning to night, steadily, constantly. He went to this office at a time when the management of the Board was not satisfactory to the President. The Board was not functioning satisfactorily—it was not efficiently organized. The policy of the Board was unsettled and subject to much unfavorable comment. He entered upon a very difficult job. All of us who have had anything to do with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation realize that it has been almost impossible to satisfy large elements of the public who wanted a construction placed upon the law which would make more liberal opportunities for borrowing money through the Corporation than we made possible in the act which we drew.

Mr. Fahey has not asked me to speak here, has not mentioned the subject to me. He desires his own record of service to make answer to that kind of criticism that all officials experience. Mr. Fahey is holding his office, I repeat, because of the request of the President. I know that if his personal wishes could have been carried out he would have left the office months ago. He would cheerfully surrender the job tomorrow if he consulted his personal wishes. He is at his post of duty from a high sense of duty and in the spirit of self-sacrifice.

I have reason to know that the President considers Mr. Fahey one of the most efficient officials in his administration. He is a man of the highest personal integrity, and possesses a degree of independence, as illustrated by the course he has taken in Massachusetts, which caused him to be marked as an enemy of the electric-light interests and other privileged groups. He is courageous, independent, able, broadly informed, and I might add a man of limitless industry.

I have never asked Mr. Fahey for a political favor since he has been in his present office. Appointments have been made in my own State by Mr. Fahey and under his direction which would not have always met with my approval had I been consulted. But I do know this about him, that he really and sincerely tries to obtain efficient and able public servants. If I had a criticism to make of him, it would be that he leans backward in his high conception of what is required of a public servant which results in minimizing political influence.

Mr. President, I think it would be a catastrophe if the Senate should fail to confirm Mr. Fahey, should fail to put its stamp of approval upon the fine record he has made as a citizen and, as I believe, a public official.

I observed smiles on the faces of some Senators when I referred to the fact that Mr. Fahey had been president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. The very fact that he was chosen for that office was a very high tribute to him, because everybody in the Chamber of Commerce of the United States knew the kind of a man he was, knew that he was associated with the extremely liberal, progressive business groups of this country, and knew that he was the opponent of vested interests; yet because of his ability, his industry, his devotion to his duties when he held a minor office, he was selected by that large organization to hold the important office of president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. I have reason to believe that he is not in entire sympathy with many of the policies of that organization, but he did try to do a good job in attempting to bring the organization in touch with popular views and liberal thoughts.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the Senator's account of Mr. Fahey's fine qualities; but does not the Senator recognize, from the complaint of the Senator from Georgia, that probably Mr. Fahey has exhibited an attitude such as is assumed by a great many people in charge of bureaus and departments of the Government, that they have such sublimated ideas of high public service and know no politics that they rather scorn Congress and Senators and others except when they want something, want some legislation or some appropriation.

Mr. WALSH. I have discovered that type of man in public office, but frankly I do not think Mr. Fahey fits that description.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not saying that he does.

Mr. WALSH. He is not seeking public office. I have never known him to be a candidate for public office. He has never aspired to public office, and I know that, because the President called me on the telephone and asked me about him when he thought of nominating him originally, and I know that Mr. Fahey did not seek the office and made a personal sacrifice in accepting the office. I also know that he was under consideration for a position in the Cabinet.

I do think it is true that he may be so overzealous in his work and so tremendously industrious that he does not like to be confronted with what Senators are met with every day and have to respond to, namely, those things which he thinks are the smaller and lesser things of administration.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH. I know that for months after he took this office—and I have not talked with him lately about it, but I did in the beginning—he spent a tremendous amount of time and energy in trying to frame and lay out the activities of this organization, and that he did everything that could be expected of a public official in trying to place the Corporation on a sound basis. His efforts were those of a tireless worker and a most conscientious official.

I know the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] will confirm my statement that the President of the United States believes that Mr. Fahey has done one of the very best jobs performed by any public official in his whole administration.

I do not wish to have it understood that I am not in sympathy with the complaints the Senator from Georgia has made as a result of his experience. I regret deeply what occurred. I wish we had had an explanation from Mr. Fahey in regard to the matter, and I am not in any way making a defense of that treatment. I am submitting to the Senate my impressions as a result of my personal observation of this man, what I know his ability to be, what I know of his concepts of public life, and what I know his political philosophy to be, and if every man on this floor knew of these things as I do, he would admire Mr. Fahey, because it has meant something in Massachusetts to publish a newspaper in the big city of Worcester——

Mr. CONNALLY. We are not asked to confirm him as the head of a newspaper, but as the head of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Mr. WALSH. But we have a right to consider a man's outlook and general philosophy.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I am delighted to hear the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts with reference to Mr. Fahey. I have known of him for many years, but never knew him personally until I came to Washington. I have known of his reputation because I originally came from Massachusetts.

I desire to say that there is not a higher type of citizen in the State of Massachusetts than is Mr. Fahey.

Mr. WALSH. I agree.

Mr. WHEELER. He is the soul of honor, an industrious, hard-working man, and while I of course believe what the Senator from Georgia has said, it is inconceivable to me that Mr. Fahey should have acted in that manner unless there was some misunderstanding on the part of someone in his office, because he just is not that kind of a man. Anybody who met him would know that he was not that type of individual. He is not an autocrat. He is a retiring gentleman. He has not any of the qualities that go with one who is autocratic or dictatorial.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, only because the Senator from Massachusetts referred to me, I should like to say that I heartily endorse everything the Senator from Massachusetts has said of Mr. Fahey. I know of no finer public servant, and I know of no man who is more devoted to the public service than he is.

I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Georgia, but I am satisfied the Senator from Montana must be right. I cannot conceive of Mr. Fahey being intentionally discourteous to any Member of the Senate, and I hope that the Senate will show by its vote its approval of a splendid public servant.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to say that I have no grievance against Mr. Fahey at all; I know nothing personal about him; but a Senator rises on the floor of the Senate and says he tried for 4 days to see Mr. Fahey but could never get to see him. Mr. Fahey did not even send a message that he could see him at a later date. I am not saying that Mr. Fahey is not all Senators say he is. We are not trying him for not being a gentleman. The Senator from Georgia has brought no charge against his character, but he has said that a United States Senator could not see the chief of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation after 4 days' effort, and there is no explanation except that he could see his assistant or second assistant.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, does the Senator not think that Mr. Fahey should be brought before the committee and that charge made against him, and he be given a chance to answer?

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to make clear on the floor of the Senate in this debate that my vote to confirm Mr. Fahey is not an approval of the conduct which he exhibited toward the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WALSH. My vote is not an approval of such conduct if the facts are as stated by the Senator from Georgia and, with the knowledge of Mr. Fahey, which I cannot concede.

Mr. CONNALLY. We have nothing to dispute them. We have the word of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have stated the facts exactly as they occurred, Mr. President. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to know that fact. I am not making the statement with any idea that it will result in Mr. Fahey not being confirmed. I expect Mr. Fahey to be confirmed, because I know how the Senate operates. However, I am getting tired of some of these miserable bureaucrats who, when a man who is elected by a State of 3,000,000 population, wishes to see him about a matter of business concerning his State, takes the position that the representative of that State is a leper of some kind, and will not let him in to see him. I take no personal affront about it, but as a representative of my State I do feel concerned about it. I have no question but that the Senate will confirm the nomination, but I wish to serve notice that I will not be placed in the position of approving of such actions on the part of any executive officer.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I am not going to vote against the confirmation of Mr. Fahey. However, I think this is a good opportunity for the Senate to show its impatience with some bureaucrats. Just as soon as they are confirmed and take office they have a perfect contempt for Congress. They cannot have any contact with this sordid world of politicians! We are all politicians, and they are all statesmen! I think that is what the Senator from Georgia had in mind more than this particular individual instance.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to say that I first became acquainted with Mr. Fahey when the Committee on Manufactures, of which at that time I happened to be chairman, was holding hearings on a bill which I introduced to establish a National Economic Council. In his testimony before that committee Mr. Fahey showed a grasp of the economic problems confronting the country which was exceptional in the highest degree.

Since that time I have known of his work in connection with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. I think it should be said there is no one of whom I know in the Government service who has given of his time, his energy, and his ability with greater generosity than has Mr. Fahey. I cannot but believe, insofar as the incident which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] has brought to the attention of the Senate is concerned, that there must be some explanation for it, because it is entirely out of keeping with the man that I know—Mr. Fahey. He is not of the bureaucratic type. I think an examination of his administration and the manner in which he has discharged the heavy responsibilities of the high position which he holds will indicate that he is not the type of person who would assume an attitude to which any Senator or any individual interested in the public service could take exception.

I do not question the statement of the Senator from Georgia that he made attempts to see Mr. Fahey, and that he was unable to do so; I accept it at its face value; but I do say, from my acquaintance with Mr. Fahey that such action is entirely out of keeping with his attitude and his demonstrated endeavor to serve the public in the capacity to which he was appointed by the President.

Mr. WALSH. I am pleased to have the Senator's confirmation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If my experience counts for anything, I think it might be well to observe that there are frequently occasions when persons who wish to see the heads of departments are excluded from them by the secretaries of the heads of those departments without their knowledge. I have known that to happen. There have been occasions when I myself have sought to get into communication with the heads of departments and found myself held off by their secretaries, but by a little persistence I eventually found no difficulty in reaching the official to whom I desired to talk.

So far as Mr. Fahey is concerned, I have known him only since the beginning of the present administration, but I can say that he is the personification of courtesy. I know that he is a man of broad and liberal sympathies, and it is inconceivable to me that he could have known personally of the incident to which the Senator from Georgia has referred.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I wish to supplement what the Senator from Wyoming has just said. I think I owe that much to Mr. Fahey. I am forced to believe that there must be some explanation of the circumstances to which the Senator from Georgia has referred.

Within the past week I submitted a rather complicated questionnaire to Mr. Fahey, and asked for certain information. I not only had a response within 24 hours, but I had a personal response, when a letter would have amply sufficed. It seems to me that that evidences Mr. Fahey's attitude when a matter is within his control and jurisdiction. There must be some answer, it seems to me, to the situation other than that which we thus far know.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I think I am in a position to know Mr. Fahey's character from my personal relations with him. I would not think of conferring with Mr. Fahey about jobs. I know he is so absorbed and so concerned about the general principles and policies of his administration that he would say to me, "Senator WALSH, will you see the personnel officer?" or "Will you see the secretary?" Senators can well understand that, coming from Massachusetts, I have had numerous requests to intervene with Mr. Fahey, yet I have not done it.

I have not objected because I knew Mr. Fahey was actuated by the very highest motives, and that he was trying in his own way to get men of efficiency and men of character, and women also, to carry on the public service.

Mr. Fahey is a man who is so absorbed in the large policies of his office and in the principles of administration, that I can appreciate it is difficult for him to get down and discuss and settle the smaller things that relate to position and place, and I can conceive of his delegating that power to others when other Senators and I have to assume such burdens, and perhaps it might be better if we did not do so much of it.

It seems to me all the finer things about Mr. Fahey outweigh the lesser and smaller things that all public officials are subjected to, to such a degree that there ought not to be any question about his confirmation.

Let me repeat, there is some satisfactory explanation to these incidents, for Mr. Fahey is too honorable to intentionally disregard the courtesies and rights every Senator is entitled to receive from administrative officials.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Mr. Fahey. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think we are entitled to a division on the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already declared the nomination confirmed. The Senator from Wisconsin demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had not expected to say anything on this question——

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my request for a division if the Senator from Wisconsin will also withdraw his request for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent to withdraw his request for a division and the Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to withdraw the order for the yeas and nays. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; the decision of the Chair stands, and the nomination of Mr. Fahey is confirmed.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, that very effectively takes me off the floor [laughter], but I am going to have something to say anyway.

Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether this objection made on the floor of the Senate was made before the committee?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, unfortunately I did not know that the nomination of Mr. Fahey was here until I happened to see it on the Executive Calendar. I did not know it was pending before the committee. I was rather under the impression, until I saw the nomination on the Calendar, that he had been appointed for a 6-year term, and was in the midst of serving that term.

Mr. NORRIS. That brings out a fact which, it seems to me, ought to have been brought out in the beginning, and which is important in passing on this question. I should not have said anything if it had not been apparent, from the vive voce vote just taken, although Mr. Fahey was confirmed, that there were a good many Senators who voted in opposition to confirmation.

If the statement made by the Senator from Georgia had been made before the committee where Mr. Fahey could have had an opportunity to be heard, I should have felt entirely different about it; but every Senator who opposes the confirmation must realize that the only objection made to it is one to which Mr. Fahey has not had an opportunity to reply or explain. That is not fair between man and man. There is nothing just about that. I do not know Mr. Fahey.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree very largely with what the Senator has said, but, under the circumstances as they have been disclosed here this afternoon, does not the Senator think Mr. Fahey owes the Senator from Georgia an explanation and an apology?

Mr. NORRIS. He probably does not know about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. He will know it tomorrow.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well, and then I have no doubt he will make an explanation. But why ask Mr. Fahey to explain something about which he has probably never heard? It may be that if Mr. Fahey testified in answer to what has been said about him here on the floor of the Senate this afternoon, I might be convinced that his nomination ought to be rejected, but if he were the worst criminal in the world it would seem to me he ought to have a hearing. He has had no opportunity to be heard. When I am now asked the question, "Do you not think Mr. Fahey ought to explain?" and I ask why he has not explained, and I am told he has had no opportunity. The statement is made in his absence in a Chamber where he has no right to enter, where his voice cannot be heard, and we are condemning him now because he does not answer a charge that he probably never heard of in his life. If that is justice, if that is the way justice is going to be dealt out in the Senate, then I would prefer to take my chances before some justice of the peace.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. Does not the Senator think, in justice to a Member of this body, who comes here and makes a statement to the effect that for 4 days he tried to get information and failed, that there ought to be some explanation?

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly, and I will meet that suggestion too. What ought to have been done, it seems to me, was to recommit the nomination to the committee and allow Mr. Fahey to come before the committee and hear what has been said about him. That would have been fair. I do not want to do any injustice to anyone, but I protest against a man being condemned here for not answering a charge which has never before been made where he could hear it or know of it.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow me, if Mr. Fahey had been notified, if we had taken the proper action and asked him to come and explain why he refused the information to the Senator from Georgia, the whole matter might have been cleared up in justice to both parties.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if that be the case, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the nomination of Mr. Fahey was confirmed may be reconsidered and that the nomination may be recommitted to the committee for the purpose of hearing Mr. Fahey.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard. The nomination of Mr. Fahey has been confirmed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I was about to remark that I have not yet finished my remarks. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska, considering the terrific pressure to which all Senators have been subjected during the present session, whether he thinks the seat occupied in this Chamber by any Senator should be declared vacant because some visitor who had not been able to see him for 4 days should cite that as a reason for his expulsion?

Mr. NORRIS. That might be considered a parallel. However, I do not want to be understood, even indirectly, as censoring the Senator from Georgia. I am asking only for fair play. If Mr. Fahey had known that the Senator from Georgia was trying to see him for 4 days and absolutely refused to see him without cause, I think that would be unpardonable conduct on his part. I venture the opinion that Mr. Fahey did not know. If he did know, it was under circumstances which made it impossible for him to see the Senator at some particular moment or time. We all know how such things happen in busy offices. I know people get angry about it when they want to see a Senator or want to see somebody else and cannot see him right away. Sometimes it is impossible to do so.

I know Mr. Fahey took this position, one of the most difficult positions in the Government, at a time when, according to my idea, it was rapidly growing into a rotten political machine where human suffering had to be increased in order even to satisfy greedy job hunters. It was a difficult situation. I do not know whether or not Mr. Fahey is diplomatic. Sometimes under such circumstances the honest man, the just man, the able man, is not diplomatic, and makes mistakes which a diplomatic man would not make. But I know Mr. Fahey took this position when it was an exceedingly difficult one and when it seemed to me that failure was staring the whole corporation in the face.

My understanding is that he has done a wonderful work under very difficult circumstances. He has all my sympathy. I tried in my weak way, when the bill was up for amendment, to insert a provision which I believe would have helped Mr. Fahey in bringing order out of chaos. I did not succeed. In the very difficult situation that existed, it was one of the most discouraging things that ever happened to me during my public life. When it seemed that there was danger of one of the most important things the Government was trying to do being a failure—it looked like a failure; it looked as though the business principles which ought to govern a corporation of this kind were going to be entirely disregarded, and we were going to make a political machine of this agency, which would have meant millions of dollars of financial loss to the taxpayers of the United States—when we were trying to get homes for individuals and fathers and mothers who were about to lose their homes, it was Mr. Fahey who came to the rescue, and made a business concern out of something which had to be made into a business concern or fail.

Before I should condemn Mr. Fahey, I should wish to give him an opportunity to be heard. I do not desire to take any chance of the Government's losing that kind of a valuable public official; and before I should think of such a thing as refusing to confirm his nomination, even if the objection came from me, I should still wish to give him an opportunity to be heard. We were about to condemn him, it seemed to me, without such a hearing. I think it would have been a terrible mistake, and would not only have been a serious impediment to the success of one of the greatest undertakings of the Government, but it seems to me it would have been a slam directly at the logic and the fair play of the Senate itself to have taken such action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. Fahey's nomination has been confirmed. The clerk will state the next nomination on the calendar.

ALICE L. WOOLMAN

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Alice L. Woolman to be postmaster at Coweta, Okla.

Mr. McKELLAR. At the request of the Senator from Oklahoma, I ask that that nomination go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will go over.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John Monroe Johnson, of South Carolina, to be Assistant Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask that that nomination go over for the day, without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination will go over without prejudice.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John B. Tansil to be United States attorney, district of Montana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of this confirmation tonight or tomorrow morning, because at the present time a term of court is being held in the city of Butte, and there is no United States attorney for that district, the former United States attorney having been promoted to the office of judge.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in view of that statement, I shall not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

The clerk will state the next nomination on the calendar.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John E. Sloan to be United States marshal, western district of Pennsylvania.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, June 20, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 19, 1935

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite God and Father of mankind, we praise Thee as we recall Thy matchless words which poured like heavenly music from the guileless lips of the Teacher of Nazareth. Let His immortal truth remain with us. His strange majesty and dignity; His gentleness with the weary, the old, the suffering and sad; His tenderness toward little children; His patience with the dull and ignorant—blessed Lord fill our lives with these exquisite graces. Our Jehovah Father, may the influence of His earthly sojourn and His undying ideals move unsympathetic and self-willed men everywhere. Do Thou touch their thoughts and themes, stirring them and putting to silence other voices. "Whosoever shall lose his life for my sake shall find it." In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ANALYSIS OF GUFFEY-SNYDER BITUMINOUS COAL CONSERVATION BILL—H. R. 8479

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include my statement on the Guffey-Snyder bituminous-coal bill which is now being considered before the Ways and Means Committee.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, the bill is drawn under two titles, the first dealing with the regulation of the industry, and the second with the creation of a national coal reserve.

TITLE I

Under title I there is a congressional declaration that the production and distribution of bituminous coal are affected with a national public interest, that such production and distribution bear upon and directly affect interstate commerce, and, for reasons set out, require that the industry be regulated in the manner provided.

Section 2 establishes in the Department of the Interior a national bituminous-coal commission of 9 members, to be appointed by the President, 5 of whom shall be disinterested, and of the other 4, 2 shall be representatives of the producers and 2 representatives of the employees. The general powers of the commission are set out, and it is provided that on any court review its findings of fact, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive.

Section 3 proposes an excise tax of 25 percent on the selling price or in the case of "captive coal", on the market value of such coal f. o. b. at the mine, with a drawback of 99 percent of this tax to producers who accept and comply with the code set out in section 4. The tax would become effective upon proclamation by the President that the code has been formulated by the commission, as provided in section 4.

SECTION 4.—THE CODE

Section 4 outlines in detail the conditions and obligations of the code under which the producers shall operate to enjoy the benefits of the drawback on taxes. It is provided that the antitrust laws shall not apply to such code members complying with the act. The code is set out in the act to avoid any question of delegated legislative power and is divided into three parts.

PART I OF CODE—ORGANIZATION AND PRODUCTION

The first part deals with production. It provides for 22 district boards and the manner of their election, and the organization of marketing agencies. The schedule of districts is appended to the bill, and their territorial arrangement is subject to change by the commission. The schedule of districts appended to the bill follows closely the code authority divisions which have been operating under the bituminous-coal code of the N. R. A. The expense of administering the code is to be borne by the code members, subject to the jurisdiction of the respective district boards. Code members may establish cooperative marketing agencies.

PART II OF THE CODE—MARKETING

Minimum prices f. o. b. mine are to be established for all the mines in each of the respective districts. Subject to the approval of the commission, the minimum prices are to be established so that in the aggregate they shall equal as closely as possible the average total cost of all the coal produced in the respective price areas as set out at pages 11 and 12 of the bill. Coal may not be sold at less than minimum prices so established.

In order to promote the fair movement of coal in the competitive markets, it is provided that district boards, with the approval of the commission, or in the absence of action by the district boards, that the commission itself, may coordinate prices in the consuming markets served by competitive districts. This coordination of prices is to take into account the kinds, qualities, and sizes of coal and transportation charges upon coal. Such coordinated prices are to be made with due regard for the minimum and maximum f. o. b. mine prices.

Maximum prices are to be established by the commission whenever it deems such action necessary in the public interest. The maximum prices would be fixed at a uniform increase above the minimum prices in effect at the time, so that in the aggregate the maximum prices would yield a reasonable return above the weighted average of the total cost. The commission may require reports from producers, which shall be kept confidential.

The price provisions of the act shall not be evaded through the use of docks or storage facilities or the use of subsidiaries or affiliates.

All sales and contracts for sale, except for export as defined, are made subject of the operation of the code prices provided for. Provision is made for the recognition of contracts made prior to the effective date of the proposed statute under conditions set out in subsection (h), page 19, of the bill.

The commission is authorized to prescribe the wholesale discount allowable to persons who resell coal in bulk, and to require the maintenance by such persons of the minimum prices prescribed under the code.

STANDARDS OF FAIR COMPETITION

A schedule of practices to be regarded as unfair methods of competition and violations of the code appears at pages 20, 21, and 22 of the bill. These provisions follow substantially the similar provisions in the bituminous-coal code of fair competition under the N. I. R. A.

PART III OF THE CODE—LABOR RELATIONS

The rights of employees follow the general outline of section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act. A bituminous-coal labor board is created of 3 members to be appointed by the President, 1 to be impartial, and of the other 2, 1 is to be a representative of the employers and 1 to be a representative of the employees. The duties of the Labor Board are designated in detail. It is also provided that where producers of more than two-thirds of the annual tonnage of the Nation and representatives of more than one-half of all employees have agreed upon maximum hours of labor, these maximum hours shall be observed by all code members. Also, that when any collective wage agreement is made between the producers of more than two-thirds of the tonnage production in any district or group of districts, and more than one-half of the mine workers therein belonging to a recognized national association of mine workers, the wages agreed upon shall be accepted as the minimum wages for the various classifications of labor by the code members operating in such district or group of districts.

This concludes the outline of the code, all of which is contained in section 4 of the bill.

Section 5 provides for the revocation by the commission of the membership of any coal producer in the code and the termination of his right to the drawback, and provides further the conditions under which he can be restored to membership. The commission is also authorized to issue cease-and-desist orders against further violation of the code. Section 5 also provides for the right of civil suit by any code member who has been injured in his business by the act of any other code member in violation of the code. This provision is in form similar to that in the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Section 6 provides that the determinations of the district boards shall be reviewed by the commission upon the appeal of any producer. The commission is authorized to establish rules for the voluntary submission to arbitration of controversies arising under the act. Provision is made for appeal to the United States circuit court of appeals from an order of the commission or of the Labor Board. There is also a provision for application by the commission to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the enforcement of its order.

Section 7 provides that all provisions of law with respect to the collection of internal-revenue taxes shall apply to taxes under the proposed act.

Section 8 authorizes the members of the commission and of the Labor Board to administer oaths to witnesses and to enforce their attendance by subpena.

Section 9 provides that if any producer decides to operate outside the provisions of the code he shall not only pay the full tax with no drawback thereon, but shall be subject to other provisions of the Federal laws regulating industries and the labor rights of employees.

Section 10 provides that the commission may require reports from producers, based upon a uniform system of accounting. Such reports shall be kept confidential and a violation of such requirement by any officer or employee of the commission or district board is made a Federal misdemeanor. Provision is also made for a fine of $50 per day for failure to file reports within 30 days after notice of default.

Section 11 provides that State laws regulating the mining of coal not inconsistent with the act shall not be affected by it.

Section 12 provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall issue no certificates of convenience or necessity authorizing extension of railroad facilities for the service of mines producing bituminous coal for commercial marketing except upon approval of the coal commission.

Section 13 provides that every corporation mining coal and shipping it in interstate commerce shall as a prerequisite to its right as a corporation so to do, file with the commission its acceptance of the provisions of title I.

Section 14 provides that bituminous coal shall not be purchased by the United States or any agency or contractor thereof, which has not been produced in compliance with the provisions of the code.

Section 15 contains a separability clause in the usual form.

At section 16, the bill provides that the commission shall study and report to Congress, prior to January 6, 1936, with respect to the necessity for the control of production of bituminous coal and methods of such control.

The bill further provides that the commission shall study and report upon other matters affecting the industry, including the conservation of coal, safe operation of mines, the rehabilitation of mine workers displaced from employment, and the problem of lowering distribution cost in the interest of consumers. This title I of the bill is to be in effect for a period of 4 years from the date of its enactment.

Under section 18, the coal commission is authorized to initiate and to intervene in proceedings in the Interstate Commerce Commission relating to transportation charges upon coal.

It is to be noted that acceptance and compliance with the code by the producers rests upon the application of the tax, but it is believed that this tax is sufficient to secure compliance of practically all producers. The drawback which code members will receive will leave a balance of about one-half cent per ton, which will go into the Treasury of the United States. As this will amount to about $1,750,000 per year, it will furnish more revenue than should be needed by the Government to administer the act.

TITLE II.—THE BITUMINOUS-COAL RESERVE

Section 1 contains the congressional declaration respecting the provisions of the title.

Section 2 provides that upon approval of the national bituminous-coal commission the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to purchase coal mines and lands containing bituminous-coal deposits suitable for mining. Just compensation according to law is provided for the owners of lands acquired by condemnation.

Section 3 provides that owners may make voluntary offers subject to acceptance under conditions set out in the section.

Section 4 provides for rights of condemnation as incident to the establishment of this coal reserve.

Section 5 provides that no coal lands of this reserve shall be used for mining except upon the order of the national coal commission and except in time of war.

Section 6 places all public lands containing coal deposits in this coal reserve.

Section 7 provides for rights-of-way and easements across lands.

Section 8 appropriates $300,000,000 to be provided by an issue of $300,000,000 2½-percent 50-year tax-exempt Government bonds, to be expended as follows: Where lands are purchased the bonds are to be accepted at par and where lands are condemned the bonds are to be sold at the best market price obtainable to provide funds for such condemnation.

Section 9 levies a graduated tax per ton on the annual bituminous-coal output, beginning with 1936. Of the taxes collected in the years 1936 to 1939, inclusive, an amount equal to 25 percent of the bonds issued by the Government shall be paid into a fund for the rehabilitation of the mine workers displaced from employment by the operation of title II, and the balance shall be applied to the administration cost of title II of the act, the payment of interest upon such bonds, and the creation of a sinking fund to retire the principal thereof. The tax would be imposed until such time as the full amount of the necessary sinking fund had been provided.

Section 10 provides that all revenues derived from these coal lands shall be paid into the sinking fund for the service and redemption of the bonds.

Section 11 provides that upon the termination of the national bituminous-coal commission under title I, its functions under title II shall be exercised by a national bituminous-coal reserve board, to be appointed by the President.

LABOR-DISPUTES BILL

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 263.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 263

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 1958, a bill to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Labor, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 97]

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and forty-three Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 8554, Rept. 1261) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1935, and June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all points of order on the bill be considered as waived.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MARTIN of Colorado). The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all points of order against the bill be considered as waived. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD at this point to show the allocation of the $20,000,000 contained in the deficiency appropriation bill for veterans' hospital extensions, and to include in it a letter from General Hines, of the Veterans' Administration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, sometime ago I called a meeting of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation for the purpose of holding hearings on the question of hospitalization, and I invited Gen. Frank T. Hines, of the Veterans' Administration, to appear and testify.

We found that many extensions, improvements, and replacements were necessary in order to take care of the present load—especially the N. P. load.

It was agreed that the Federal Board of Hospitalization should take the proposition up and report back to the committee. That has been done, so far as extensions and replacements are concerned. It was found that it would take about $20,000,000 to complete that program.

The Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations conferred with me and agreed to include this amount in the bill which he has just reported.

This does not include any new hospitals; that question is still being considered by the Federal Board of Hospitalization.

At this point I desire to insert a letter which I received from General Hines on June 12, 1935, to which is attached a list of the proposed constructions and replacements of hospital and domiciliary beds.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, June 12, 1935.

Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN,
Chairman World War Veterans Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RANKIN: Confirming our conversation of this morning, on Monday, June 10, I presented to the Appropriations Committee of the House a construction program covering the anticipated needs of the Veterans' Administration for the next 5 years. For your information, I am enclosing a list showing the number, type, and cost of beds which it is proposed to provide at each of our facilities which will be affected. This program does not contemplate the establishment of new facilities, which matter the Federal Board of Hospitalization has now under consideration. In case of favorable consideration of any of the pending questions in this connection by the Federal Board of Hospitalization and the President, the appropriation of additional funds from the $4,000,000 unexpended balance under act approved March 4, 1931, will be requested.

While this program previously has been submitted to the National Emergency Council, I am requesting that organization to delete from our applications the items covered by the attached list. This is being done for the reason that in accordance with established procedure I believe that all matters involving additional beds should be passed upon individually by the Federal Board of Hospitalization and the President, which procedure will, of course, be followed in case funds for the program under discussion are appropriated. Applications covering various items of repair, remodeling, and improvement, and the rounding out of existing facilities are still pending before the National Emergency Council, and additional applications of the same nature made up largely of work which appropriately may be accomplished by the direct employment of labor and purchase of materials are in process of being submitted.

It will be noted that the greater part of the additional beds covered on the attached list are for the treatment of beneficiaries suffering from neuropsychiatric disability. As indicated by the summary, 6,835 neuropsychiatric beds, including the replacement of 134 now housed in unsatisfactory facilities, are recommended. Recommendations also cover 455 tuberculosis beds, which include the replacement of 300 beds now in unsatisfactory facilities. Of the 2,276 general medical and surgical beds recommended, 800 are replacements; and of the 2,250 domiciliary beds recommended, 1,400 are replacements.

The number of neuropsychiatric beds recommended is based on a recent survey by each regional office in the country of the number of such beneficiaries at home awaiting admission to Government psychotic hospitals, and the number of veterans with mental diseases in State, civil, municipal, or private hospitals. The additional beds recommended are being distributed at existing facilities to correspond very closely with the indicated needs of the areas served. Five hundred and fourteen N. R. beds recommended are for colored patients; 330 additional G. M. beds for colored are also recommended.

The replacement of 300 tuberculosis beds at Whipple Barracks, Ariz., is necessary for the reason that this facility is housed in part in buildings of permanent construction which form a part of the old Army post and in part in temporary buildings of war-time construction. Clinical and surgical facilities are very poorly arranged and scattered throughout several buildings, and in certain cases are located in buildings which are not of substantial construction. The ear, eye, nose, and throat clinic, the dental clinic, dispensary, and pathological laboratory are in one building of war-time construction. The X-ray and physiotherapy equipment are housed in the old Army post exchange and gymnasium, and the surgery in another building nearly a quarter of a mile away. The surgery is obsolete and entirely inadequate to serve the needs of the facility.

The replacement of domiciliary beds at Los Angeles is necessary in order to remove beneficiaries from old frame barracks buildings which are of light construction, unsafe structurally, and which constitute an exceedingly serious fire hazard. These buildings have been badly damaged by termites and their replacement with fireproof modern construction is exceedingly necessary. The domiciliary beds recommended for female beneficiaries are in order to take care of the existing load in the area which is not now provided for.

The additional beds recommended at Livermore, Calif., are to provide a reasonable number of single rooms for acutely ill and terminal cases, this hospital being deficient in this respect.

The administration building recommended at Newington, Conn., is in order to permit of the removal of regional office facilities from inadequate and very badly ventilated space in the basement of the main building, and to provide a small number of additional beds.

The additional domiciliary beds recommended for the Bay Pines, Fla., facility are to provide for the requirements at this station. It will be noted that there are included domiciliary facilities for female beneficiaries who at present are not provided for in this area. The additional general beds recommended are to maintain a proper relationship and to supplement other general medical and surgical facilities in the area which at present are inadequate. The additional beds recommended for Lake City, Fla., are in order to provide very necessary improvements in connection with the existing clinical reception and post-surgical services. The present facilities in this respect are unsatisfactory and inadequate.

There is in process of establishment at Atlanta, Ga., special facilities for the treatment of malignant conditions which are occurring with greater frequency throughout the service. In order to provide for the completion of this special clinic, additional construction to house the number of beds indicated will be required.

The 100 additional general medical beds for colored which have been recommended for Alexandria, La., are badly needed to take care of existing needs in the area served.

The replacement of 350 domiciliary beds at Togus, Maine, is recommended in order that beneficiaries may be taken out of existing frame barracks which are about 40 years old, beyond the stage of reasonable maintenance costs, and so arranged as to constitute an exceedingly serious fire hazard.

The added domiciliary beds at Biloxi, Miss., are recommended to provide for the needs of the area. This enlargement will provide for more economical operation as compared with the present small capacity of this facility.

The administration building recommended at Batavia, N. Y., is in order to permit of the removal of regional office facilities from inadequate and very badly ventilated space in the basement of the main building, and to provide a small number of additional beds.

The construction recommended at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., will provide for the removal of the main kitchen and dining room and the recreation hall from the main building where they are located at present. The existing situation in this respect is decidedly undesirable, and the establishment of the activities mentioned in separate buildings will provide for much more satisfactory operation than is possible at present, and will also provide for approximately 50 additional beds at this station, which is at present filled to beyond its rated capacity.

The domiciliary beds recommended for the Dayton facility are to replace several existing barracks which are in a very bad state of preservation. One of them has been condemned as being structurally unsafe, and the others are so deteriorated as to result in unreasonable maintenance and operation costs. They are not of fire-resistant construction, and their condition is such that they may not economically be remodeled. Domiciliary beds recommended for female beneficiaries are to provide for the needs in the area, and in line with the policy of establishing such facilities at several focal points throughout the country. The general medical and surgical beds recommended are to provide for the subdivision of the large wards in the present hospital building so as to provide for more satisfactory operation and a reasonable degree of privacy to the patients.

The additional beds both for white and colored beneficiaries which have been recommended for Columbia, S. C., are to take care of the needs of the area served.

The 100 general medical and surgical beds recommended for Hot Springs, S. Dak., are needed in order to provide for the establishment of a satisfactory surgical service at this facility. At present the surgical service is located on the main floor of the administration building where it is at a distance from the bulk of hospital beds, and due to its age it is not feasible to replace it in its present location.

A new hospital building of fireproof construction is urgently needed at Hampton, Va., to replace the present nonfireproof structure which was built more than 30 years ago, and which on account of its condition and arrangement cannot be successfully rehabilitated and modernized.

At Milwaukee, Wis., a new fireproof hospital building is needed for the replacement of a building which was constructed in 1879, and which is in such poor physical condition and so poorly arranged that it cannot be successfully modernized nor rendered reasonably fire resistant.

The additional beds recommended for Cheyenne, Wyo., will permit of the development of that facility to economical operating capacity. These beds are needed in order that beneficiaries who are now cared for in nonfireproof contract facilities may be housed in modern fireproof structures.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Administrator.

EDWARD T. TAYLOR

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, today marks the seventy-seventh anniversary of the birth of the honorable and distinguished acting majority leader of the House, EDWARD THOMAS TAYLOR, of the State of Colorado. [Applause.] Our eminent colleague and friend entered upon his service here at the mature age of 51, and today, while serving with distinction his fourteenth consecutive term, his eye is not dim nor his natural force abated. He has achieved a distinction, never the lot of any other man in the history of the Congress of the United States. His service here is unique. Other men who have served in the House—not many—have had a greater span of life than the gentleman from Colorado has now reached; still other men—exactly 14—among 10,000, were elected successively for 14 or more terms without a break in the continuity of their service, but no man other than EDWARD THOMAS TAYLOR was ever elected for 14 consecutive terms after he had passed the half century mark of his natural life. When his service began on March 4, 1909, he lacked only 3 months and 15 days before reaching his fifty-first milestone. This is a record, nobly achieved and richly deserved; and I predict it will remain unsurpassed in the annals of Congress. Those other 14 Representatives accredited with 14 or more unbroken terms constitute a roll of honor, 4 of whom, including the present able and distinguished occupant of the chair, were Speakers of the House, and some of them in their day and generation were reverently accorded the title of "Father of the House."

I deem it pertinent and a matter of interest to the House and to the country on this, the anniversary of the natal day of our friend from Colorado, briefly to record the names of the men on this roll of honor, their service longevity, and respective ages upon their entrance into Congress, namely:

Henry Harrison Bingham, of Pennsylvania, 17 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 38 years;

Thomas Stalker Butler, of Pennsylvania, 16 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 42 years;

Joseph Wellington Byrns, of Tennessee—our present Speaker—14 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 40 years;

John Nance Garner, of Texas—a former Speaker and now Vice President—15 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 35 years;

Frederick Huntington Gillett, of Massachusetts—a former Speaker—16 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 42 years;

Gilbert N. Haugen, of Iowa, 17 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 40 years;

William Atkinson Jones, of Virginia, 14 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 42 years;

William Darrah Kelley, of Pennsylvania, 15 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 47 years;

James Robert Mann, of Illinois, 14 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 41 years;

Thomas Newton, Jr., of Virginia, 14 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 33 years;

Edward William Pou, of North Carolina, 17 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 48 years;

Samuel Jackson Randall, of Pennsylvania—a former Speaker—14 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 35 years;

Adolph Joseph Sabath, of Illinois, 15 successive years—still with us and vigorous—entered Congress at the age of 41 years;

Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, 14 successive terms—upon whom the title of "Father of the House" was first bestowed—entered Congress at the age of 29 years; and

Edward Thomas Taylor, of Colorado, our distinguished acting majority leader, 77 years young today, 14 successive terms; entered Congress at the age of 51 years, and still going strong.

On this roll of honor are those only who were elected for 14 or more continuous terms. I should like to include the name of the late Honorable Joseph Gurney Cannon, affectionately known as "Uncle Joe", but unfortunately his service was not continuous, having been twice interrupted, once after 9 successive terms and again after 10 successive terms. However, his aggregate service covered a period of 46 years, longer than any other man's, living or dead, and for four terms he was Speaker of the House.

Mr. Speaker, our young friend from the top of the world also holds several other enviable records. He represents the most altitudinous congressional district in the United States. There are as many mountain peaks in his district as there were years of his life when he first came here. Is it any wonder then that he has climbed to heights of eminence as a Member of Congress?

Moreover, to EDWARD THOMAS TAYLOR belongs the distinction of holding the record in the House of Representatives for length of continuous service among Democratic Members from the section west of the Missouri River comprising 15 States. No other Democrat equals this record, and only one, the late Senator Francis P. Newlands, of Nevada, exceeds it for service in both the House and Senate.

The record of the gentleman from Colorado is distinguished for another thing: Fourteen times he has been elected in a district traditionally Republican in its politics. I only hope that his people have not formed an incurable habit, and if his constituents are determined to elect a Democrat to Congress, I sincerely hope they will continue to elect EDWARD TAYLOR or one of his type if another can be found in the Rocky Mountains, which I very much doubt.

Mr. Speaker, I felicitate our friend the illustrious gentleman from Colorado on this important day in his life, and I think I voice the warm admiration and affection all Members of the House, without respect to party, have for him as a man of splendid character; for his ability which he has signally demonstrated in the discharge of the arduous and delicate duties of acting majority leader, for his fairness, and for his unfailing courtesy, and to wish for him greater length of days, happiness, peace, and contentment.

Someone has said that life begins at 40. Taking our distinguished friend as a criterion, I would say life begins at 50. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I join in what I know is the unanimous feeling and sentiment of each and every Member of this House in congratulating and felicitating our colleague the distinguished Representative from the State of Colorado, Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, on this momentous occasion. As has been stated by our loved and distinguished minority leader [Mr. SNELL], Mr. TAYLOR today passes his seventy-seventh milestone in his earthly pilgrimage. I am sure that he possesses to the fullest degree the warm and unshaken friendship, as well as the complete confidence of every Member of this House.

When I was elected a Member of the Sixty-second Congress and took my seat in this great body in April 1911 Mr. Taft was President of the United States. We were called together in extraordinary session on account of the negotiation of the reciprocity treaty with the Canadian Government. I early formed an acquaintance, which grew into an abiding and continuous friendship with the gentleman from Colorado, and as the years have come and gone that friendship has grown to one of affection and I might say of love. There are in this House today but four men who have had consecutive service since that time, beginning with the Sixty-second Congress; our honored and beloved Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], and myself.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY], the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK], and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] also were Members of that Congress, but their service has not been consecutive.

Mr. TAYLOR has served faithfully and well not only his constituents who honored him by keeping him here continuously so long, but he has served the Nation equally well. He has established and maintained the highest standard of human excellence of service in this body. No one has been more courageous, no one has been more assiduous in his duties, no man has attained a higher standard of fidelity than the gentleman from Colorado. He has served his constituents in a district, as has been mentioned by the gentleman from New York, which is normally Republican. That he has had their confidence and their support during all these years demonstrates that service in this body to be of a high and patriotic order, where a man first gives adherence to his country rather than his party, does not go without reward.

I feel today, Mr. Speaker, that those of us who have been here so long are most fortunate in having had the opportunity of serving with ED TAYLOR. I have never known a more kindly man, a more considerate man, a man more diligent and more faithful in the discharge of every duty incident to his public service; and my sincere hope is that our good friend and colleague, ED TAYLOR, may celebrate his one hundredth anniversary as a Member of this House [applause]; that on that occasion our distinguished and loved Speaker may still be Speaker [applause]; and that on that same occasion our likeable and distinguished minority leader, than whom there is no finer gentleman, may still be minority leader. [Applause.]

Mr. BLOOM. With continuous service.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; and that his service may have been continuous and unbroken.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the Membership of this House for affording me this opportunity to join in the sentiment I know is felt by every Member of this House in extending congratulations and felicitations to our beloved colleague, ED TAYLOR. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to heartily join in the tributes which have been paid by the distinguished minority leader and the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to the services of our friend and colleague, ED TAYLOR, from the State of Colorado. I do so, Mr. Speaker, with a peculiar and particular pleasure. I came into the Congress on March 4, 1909, and amongst the new Members who were sworn in on that day were our friend, ED TAYLOR, and our friend, JOHN MARTIN, from the State of Colorado, who is now presiding over the House. [Applause.] I have, therefore, known Mr. TAYLOR longer than I have known any other Member of the House, with two or three exceptions.

I need not say that our relations have always been of the most friendly, kindly, and intimate nature. I have learned to love him during all these years as you who have served with him likewise have learned to love him, not only for his kindly nature, his generous soul, and his sympathetic heart, but also because we recognize in him a Member who has given the best that is in him to his district, to his State, and to his Nation. As a matter of fact, the only real, genuine, and satisfying compensation that comes to a Member from his service here is the knowledge that he has endeavored to render service to his country. I speak of this as compensation because it is the only real satisfaction that Members of Congress who have been honored by their constituents as their representatives to serve them in legislation and in other matters in Washington realize in their service here. Measured by this standard, measured by the standard of service to his district, service to his State, and service to his country, ED TAYLOR has been as richly compensated during the years he has been here as any Member who has ever served. [Applause.]

I join with those who have preceded me and with those who may follow me in paying tribute to him not only by way of expression of our affection and esteem, but also as a recognition of that service he has given so freely, so earnestly, and so ably to his Nation. I hope that he may live long to continue to represent the people of his district whom he has served so intelligently and with such great fidelity. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished dean of the House [Mr. SABATH]. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I unreservedly subscribe to everything that has been said of the distinguished gentleman from Colorado, who celebrates today his seventy-seventh birthday. I regret that I cannot add a great deal to what has been so appropriately and justifiably said, not, however, because there is not much more to add in recognition of the important public service of this splendid gentleman but because time does not permit.

I had the honor, the pleasure, and the distinction of being a Member of this House when the two youngsters, the gentleman from Colorado, whom we are honoring today, and our beloved Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee, became Members. I have the distinction of having served with at least 1,500 different men and women in this House, and I say honestly and sincerely that I have never known any Member whom I believed more deserving of the spontaneous and heartfelt tributes that have been paid here today than the gentleman from Colorado, my friend, Mr. TAYLOR.

I have known him long and well. We lived in the same little modest hotel for many years. May I say that he is not entitled to all the credit he is receiving today for his length of service in this body, his achievements, and his popularity in Colorado. I have the pleasure of knowing his charming spouse also [applause]; and there is no sweeter, more lovable, or more accomplished character than she; therefore, I feel that it is due to the splendid care which she has taken of this gentleman during his days of illness that we have the pleasure of having him still with us. I recollect that about 12 years ago, due to strenuous work, the sincerity of and devotion to his duties here, Mr. TAYLOR suffered a nervous break-down, which many of us feared he would not overcome; but, thanks to that splendid lady, he is still with us, with undiminished fervor and mental and physical vigor. I hope he will continue to be with us for many, many years to come.

Though Mr. TAYLOR is a partisan Democrat, he is a man who feels that his duties are first to the Nation and his State. Many times some of us on our side have thought we should vote for a certain bill that we thought was a party measure; but Mr. TAYLOR followed the dictates of his just heart and ripe mind, if he thought the interests of the people of his State and the Nation were better served by voting against the measure. He is a man who must be recognized as an outstanding statesman, a man who has the interests of the Nation and the people at heart at all times, regardless of whether his party and his associates agree or disagree with him. He has been honest, he has been sincere, he has been devoted to his duty, and I congratulate the people of his State for reelecting him for 14 consecutive terms and the Nation for its opportunity in these hectic times to draw upon his singular qualities of first-rate conservative, scholarly broad-minded statesmanship, whose first consideration is welfare of country. I hope the great State which he so ably represents in part will continue to reelect him to this body, unless he changes his mind and desires to foresake this side of the Congress to become a Member of the other body.

May I say that he has had several opportunities to accept what many consider a promotion, but he has refused because of the affection and unselfish zeal he has for his engrossing and important work in the House of Representatives.

EDWARD TAYLOR, I hope you will convey to Mrs. Taylor our best wishes, because I know that if all the other Members knew her as well as I, they would join me in felicitating not only you but also your estimable life companion on this happy occasion. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the honor of presiding on this occasion would be entirely sufficient for me, but since the Speaker has kindly mentioned me as one of the three men who came into the Sixty-first Congress with himself and my beloved colleague, ED TAYLOR, perhaps I can add a fitting and not uninteresting word to these services.

I suppose that I might hold myself up as a horrible example to the young, ambitious men of this body. JOE BYRNS, ED TAYLOR, and I stood up in this Well on the 4th day of March 1909 and raised our right hands and became Members of the Sixty-first Congress. As stated by the Speaker, we are the only three men left who became Members of that Congress. One of us is the Speaker of the House, the other is the acting majority leader, while I am a junior member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, on which committee I served 25 years ago, and only this morning I acted as chairman of a subcommittee of that committee, which is the highest distinction I have achieved in connection with my present congressional services. May I say to the younger Members that I stayed two terms and quit, and that if you want to sit up there where JOE BYRNS is sitting or back there where ED TAYLOR is sitting, you cannot drop out of Congress for 20 years.

But, Mr. Speaker, I receive great consolation from the philosophy of Emerson, who said: "There is no gain without a loss and no loss without a gain." The distinguished minority leader has recounted the achievements of men with a longevity record in the House, but there is a question in my mind whether it is a greater achievement to come here and stay 20 years or go out for 20 years and come back. [Applause.] I think if the honored minority leader will look up the record he will probably find that there are less men who stayed out 20 years and came back than stayed here 20 years in the first place. [Laughter.]

Just a word about my colleague, ED TAYLOR. He is without question the most valuable man for the West, not only in either House of Congress, but in Washington. He came here 25 years ago with a background of 12 years in the Senate of the State of Colorado. I say without fear of contradiction that he is better informed about western conditions, western resources, and western needs than any man in Washington. I do not have to tell the Members of the House that he is always on the job. [Applause.] I think Colorado would be wise if it kept ED TAYLOR in Washington as long as he is able to sit in a chair and may that be a long, long time. [Applause.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article which appeared in the United States News of June 17 regarding the Honorable EDWARD T. TAYLOR. I think this is of enough importance to be included in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article appearing in the issue of the United States News, pertaining to my colleague, the Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, of Colorado, which I know is eminently well deserved and is appreciated by the people of Colorado, and I feel that it is worthy of being preserved in the RECORD of this date, his seventy-seventh birthday.

[From the United States News]

WHO'S WHO IN THE GOVERNMENT—EDWARD T. TAYLOR, ACTING MAJORITY LEADER OF THE HOUSE—COLORADO LAWYER, WHO HAS WRITTEN A HUNDRED FEDERAL LAWS

There are a number of things about Representative EDWARD T. TAYLOR, de facto majority leader of the House of Representatives, that make him an outstanding figure.

In the first place, his tall body, straight as an arrow, carries 76 years as if they were but 60 and his record likewise carries a list of achievements in lawmaking that would be hard to beat. Forty measures of his enacting are now on the books of his native State, Colorado, and he has written more than a hundred Federal laws.

And then, of course, his district is "the top of the world." It comprises some 40 of the tallest peaks of the Rockies, rich in ore and filled with names that are a part of the glamorous history of America's gold-mining days.

And another thing that makes Representative TAYLOR unique is his period of service. He is the only man in history entering Congress at the age of 50 who has served as many as 14 consecutive terms.

PUBLIC WORK HE HAS DONE

Recently when some nimble-penned artist attempted to portray in picture the achievements of this "top of the world Congressman" he had a hard time getting his sketches into the space allotted him. He drew a gushing pipe to symbolize a quarter-century fight for water rights, a sack of money representing the allotment for the "biggest reclamation project" in western Colorado, and a span of State roads through forest and over mountain running from Denver to Grand Junction, over the Tennessee River Pass and through the Colorado River Canyon. Sheep, cattle, and silver filled the rest of the picture, representing the two industries, stock raising and mining, which have been assisted by Mr. TAYLOR.

Of the long list of bills which Representative TAYLOR has written, two are most frequently mentioned in connection with his name. One was the act that changed the name of the Grand River to the Colorado and the other is the Taylor Grazing Act. Both represented long hard battles and both were inspired by the intense State loyalty which Mr. TAYLOR bears. Of course, the grazing act was national in scope and the Colorado River is vital to the seven States which it touches and to the great Boulder Dam which stores its waters.

BEGAN LIFE ON A FARM

Mr. TAYLOR'S father was born in England but was brought to this country by his parents when he was a year old and was reared on a farm near Jacksonville, Ill. EDWARD TAYLOR began his life on an Illinois farm, too, but later moved to a stock ranch in western Kansas. He was graduated from the high school in Leavenworth, Kans., in 1881. After graduation he started West looking for a job and ended up as principal of the high school in Leadville, Colo.

The next fall he left Leadville to attend the University of Michigan law school. When he had won his sheepskin at Ann Arbor he returned to Leadville and began practice in the office of his uncle. His public life began at once for in the year of his graduation he was elected county superintendent of schools. The next year he was made deputy district attorney. In 1887 he moved to Glenwood Springs where he went into law partnership with his brother and the same year was elected district attorney of the northwestern Colorado district.

LONG IN COLORADO SENATE

In 1896 he was elected State senator and served for 12 years. It was then that Mr. TAYLOR'S versatility as an author of legislation became evident and besides his 40 statutes he is credited with five State constitutional amendments. He held other public offices and was active in national Democratic politics, organizing a bureau of naturalized citizens at Chicago in 1916 and afterward campaigning extensively in the West among the foreign born.

Twenty-six years ago he was elected to Congress. There is now only one other man who with him entered that (the 61st) Congress. That is Speaker BYRNS.

INTEREST IN PUBLIC LANDS

Mr. TAYLOR'S interest centers on the Appropriations Committee of which he is vice chairman and also chairman of the subcommittee which is in charge of the Interior Department bill.

And when it comes to the Interior Department Mr. TAYLOR is right at home. His interest in the public domain goes back to his district and some of his earliest activities as a lawyer were when he adjudicated an important drainage case. He has battled for reclamation and for the Forestry Service; twice he saved the Hoover Dam Act from defeat and he watches that project like a hawk. Only recently he filed a brief with Secretary of the Interior Ickes, looking to assurance that no governmental activity would be permitted to nullify any of the rights under the compact of the States for the development of the Colorado River.

FILLS DIFFICULT POST WELL

For the most part Mr. TAYLOR has kept out of the inner political disputes of the House; he is never self-assertive and his present difficult job of leader, where he has to exercise control over men who elected someone else for the office, has been marked by a suavity and urbanity which few could muster under the circumstances.

When Representative BANKHEAD fell ill on the eve of taking over the office of floor leader to which he had just been elected it was at first thought another election would be held. But Representative BANKHEAD chose to make Representative TAYLOR his delegate and this course was insisted upon. Since Mr. BANKHEAD is still very ill, Mr. TAYLOR has been leader in everything but name since January 3.

Irrigation, mining, administration of public lands are all familiar topics to this sturdy champion of the open spaces and he is known throughout the West as one of the great human factors in its development in the last quarter century and more.

He has served on various committees dealing with these subjects and he is credited with effective work on the special committee that drafted the present Budget law.

Quiet and courteous, he devotes most of his time to his committee work, supplemented now by his duties as floor leader. He takes very little part in the social life of Washington. He is married and has three children, two sons and a daughter.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, it does me good to witness this deserved tribute being paid to my colleague in the House and to my colleague on the Appropriations Committee. Should anything happen to me, he would become chairman of that great committee. I unhesitatingly say to the Members of this House that if that should happen the fiscal affairs of this Government would be in safe-keeping in the hands of ED TAYLOR, of Colorado. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR'S services to his State and to the Nation are of great value, but however valuable his services may be, his life is more valuable to the youth of this country. It demonstrates this great truth in life that if you will inform yourself, preserve yourself, moderate yourself, and live for your fellow men that they may live for you, you will gain steadfast footing at every step, mounting at length to eminence and distinction and becoming an ornament to your family and a blessing to your country. This has been the history of the service and character of ED TAYLOR. [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, other old-time friends in the House have referred to the long and distinguished service in the Congress of our beloved colleague, ED TAYLOR. But I believe I have known ED TAYLOR longer than anyone within the reach of my voice or in the city of Washington. I was quite a young boy when I first met ED TAYLOR. Even then he was and had been for many years a prominent public man in the State of Colorado. County superintendent of schools in Lake County, of which the celebrated mining town of Leadville is the county seat; city attorney of Glenwood Springs and county attorney of Garfield County; deputy district attorney and later district attorney for the judicial district comprising all of northwestern Colorado; for 12 years one of the leaders in the Colorado State Senate and for 2 years president pro tempore thereof, and acting lieutenant governor. A distinguished lawyer specializing in irrigation and water rights. He had deservedly won the high respect of the people of our State for his public services in our State. His name even then was a household word. All the citizens of Colorado, regardless of party, have rejoiced in his splendid services for the Nation in his wider field here in Congress, but long before he came to Washington he had distinguished himself at home.

I am delighted to add a further tribute of regard and affection to his charming and able wife.

Whatever the vicissitudes of politics may be in the future, whatever the mutations of party, the people of Colorado will continue to send ED TAYLOR down here to represent our State, the West, and the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to subscribe to and endorse all of the fine things that have been said here this morning about our good friend and colleague, ED TAYLOR. He is worthy of every tribute here spoken. I never knew a finer gentleman.

I have risen this morning simply to make this statement. There are only three Members of this body today who saw and heard the distinguished Speaker, JOE BYRNS, our friend the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. TAYLOR, and the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. MARTIN, take the oath of office on March 4, 1909. I refer to the dean of the House, Judge SABATH, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. FOCHT, and myself. We are the only three who are Members of Congress today who were Members of Congress when these three distinguished gentlemen became Members of this body more than 26 years ago.

I lived at the same hotel, old Congress Hall, with our good friend, his good wife, and three fine kiddies for 14 years. I have known him intimately and well all these years. I know that he is always gentle, gracious, courteous, and kind, a true gentleman and an able statesman. He has made a very distinguished record in this House and enjoys the respect, confidence, and good will of all, regardless of the dividing aisle. None know him but to love him.

May I also say that while the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. MARTIN, has a record that is unique, I am also rather proud of my own record, which is also unique, if you will pardon me for injecting it into the RECORD at this time. I was in Congress 14 years, I was out 14 years, and then came back, and not only came back, my friends, but came back bringing with me five fine prospective candidates for a seat in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, my fervent hope and wish is that our distinguished colleague and friend the gentleman from Colorado, Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, may be permitted to serve at least a dozen more years and establish a longevity legislative record unknown in the annals of this body.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of the House, I cannot adequately express my sincere appreciation and gratitude for your most generous expressions of friendship and good will. I especially thank the minority leader of the House, Mr. SNELL, of New York, and the Speaker of the House, Mr. BYRNS, of Tennessee, and the father of the House, not in years but in service, Mr. SABATH, of Illinois, and all the other gentlemen who have so kindly joined in these felicitations.

I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his courteous reference to my wife, and I am proud to acknowledge that I would have disappeared from this floor many years ago if it had not been for the fact that for over 40 years my wife has been a constant guardian angel. [Applause.]

I can scarcely realize that this is in one respect the most rare and unique birthday greeting that has ever been accorded to any Member of this House. I am as proud as anyone can be of my membership in this great deliberative body, and supremely appreciative of the friendships of so many hundreds of splendid Members. It has been a great honor and privilege and a marvelous opportunity for service to our country and to the West and my home centennial State in particular. Two generations of the people of western Colorado have honored and trusted me during my public life extending over half a century. I am profoundly grateful to them. No Member of this House has ever had a more loyal backing from home than I have, and I am proud of them and I hope they will always be proud of me.

Life is a marvelous moving-picture show these days, and we ought all to be grateful of being members of the board of directors of our great Government and of the opportunities as well as the obligations that that trust involves.

But I will not make any speech. I just want to again thank you all from the bottom of my heart for this most wonderful official birthday party that has ever been given to any Member of Congress during the history of our country. It will always be one of my dearest recollections as long as I live; and I will conclude by fervently saying to you boys and girls: May the Lord take you all, but not for a long time after your seventy-seventh birthday. [Applause.]

CONFERENCE REPORT—NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. GARY submitted a conference report (Rept. No. 1262) on the bill (H. R. 7672) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

BUNK AND NONSENSE FROM MR. WILLIAMS

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, in the course of a moderate amount of experience, I have seldom read more bunk and nonsense veiled in highbrow language than the article of James T. Williams, Jr., which appeared in the Hearst papers recently under the heading, "'Dictatorship' Championed by Supreme Court Critic." In this article, Mr. Williams, with zeal worthy of a better cause, goes to great length to misrepresent my proposal regarding two amendments to the Constitution.

In order to put an end to the oft-repeated thwarting of the will of the people by the Supreme Court by declaring humane laws "unconstitutional", I urged amendments to the basic law:

First. So that the Government can take any steps it finds necessary to assure every able-bodied, full-grown citizen engaged in useful labor of the comforts of life, as well as to assure the same to the disabled, sick, aged, and minors.

Second. So that henceforth the Supreme Court will never again have the power to block humanitarian enactments by branding them unconstitutional.

Mr. Williams starts off with a misrepresentation in his first paragraph. He says:

> Toward the overthrow by popular referendum of the Government of the Constitution comes now Congressman HILDEBRANDT (Democrat), of South Dakota, with a specific program.

Mr. Williams is sufficiently intelligent to know that I proposed nothing of the sort. Amending the Constitution is not "overthrow of the Government of the Constitution." Does Mr. Williams believe the average citizen in his right mind will think that it is?

If I am not mistaken, the American Constitution was the first constitution in the history of the world to make specific provision for its own amendment. Constitutions under monarchies and other forms of despotism were supposed to be fixed, static, unchangeable documents that never could be altered. The American Constitution was adopted as a document that was subject to amendment when the people desired. It was intended to be responsive to popular will under certain conditions. Therefore, a way was provided for changing it.

I have proposed that we utilize the provisions of this very same Constitution for which Mr. Williams professes such noisy enthusiasm and adopt two amendments.

Did it ever occur to Mr. Williams that the Constitution has been amended a score of times already and that in the infancy of the Nation, the first 10 amendments—the Bill of Rights—were added in a single group?

Now we come to another of Mr. Williams' numerous misrepresentations of my position. He states that—

> The former passenger-train conductor who represents the First South Dakota District in the present Congress appears to think dictatorship offers the only relief from what he is pleased to term the "tyranny" of the American system of government, which he took an oath on the floor of the House to support when he began his present congressional term.

For one thing, I did not advocate dictatorship but industrial and political democracy.

For another thing, I have never said one syllable about "the tyranny of the American system of government." On the contrary, I urged using the existing provisions of this system of government to amend the Constitution so that its terms cannot possibly conflict with passing laws to end poverty and suffering, and so that the Supreme Court may no longer exercise authority that it was not originally intended to have. The tyranny is not in the system of government we have but in certain abuses that can be corrected.

Mentioning the oath that a Congressman takes to support the Constitution, Mr. Williams seeks to spread the impression that in some strange and incomprehensible way I have violated my oath. More bunk and nonsense!

I took an oath to support the Constitution. I did not take an oath to refrain from ever advocating an amendment to it.

Were the abolitionists in Congress, whose pioneer work paved the way for the constitutional amendment ending slavery, violators of the Constitution because they wanted it amended?

Was the wet Congressman who swore to uphold the Constitution while it contained the eighteenth amendment a violator of the fundamental law of the land because he disapproved the eighteenth amendment—which has now been repealed?

Because you take oath to obey a constitution does not forever obligate you to believe that it is perfect in every detail and to insist upon its retention for the next 1,000 years.

Mr. Williams knows this. He is not fooling himself. He is trying to fool others—and he will not even do that.

The reference to myself as "the former passenger-train conductor" is meant for sarcasm, I suppose. May I suggest to Mr. Williams that if the advice of train conductors, present and former, and of other railroad men, as well as of workers generally, had been heeded to a greater degree, the masses of our country would not have been bled white by the parasites of finance—capital.

When he adds that I do "not represent the rank and file of the railway brotherhoods", he is attempting to deceive his readers into thinking that the brotherhoods are satisfied with exploitation by Wall Street and with the improper use of the Constitution and the Supreme Court to perpetuate that exploitation. Perhaps I am as familiar with their attitude as he, and I have no hesitation in asserting that they are not satisfied with these conditions. They want legislation that will assure workers of the product of their labor and they have no more false reverence than I for clauses in a 150-year old document that ought to be modernized or for "nine old men in black", as Labor, organ of the Associated Recognized Standard Railroad Labor Organizations, called them.

Mr. Williams cites two commendable decisions of the Supreme Court and refers to "case after case in which the great tribunal has fearlessly upheld the rights of the laboring man." Oh, yes; the Supreme Court has sometimes been on the laboring man's side, but none too often. And the number of its decisions in which property rights have been ranked above human rights is appalling. The Roger Taney decision regarding the fugitive slave act, the income-tax decision, the decision against the Federal anti-child-labor act, the decision in the Newberry case forbidding Congress to legislate to regulate primary elections—these are some of them. Even if the decisions of the Supreme Court had always been on the side of the toilers, this would not affect the fact that the Court did not originally have the power to declare a law unconstitutional. This power was seized years after the Nation was founded.

The difference between the reactionary and plutocratic attitude of Mr. Hearst's writer, Mr. Williams, and the viewpoint of Thomas Jefferson, who said no society should have a perpetual constitution or a perpetual law, and favored a new constitution every 35 years, is as great as the difference between noon and midnight.

For Mr. Williams' benefit, as well as the benefit of all who are unfamiliar with the opinions entertained by Jefferson regarding courts and constitutions, I quote two statements by America's great Democrat.

The first was made in 1810. It reads:

It has long, however, been my opinion, and I have never shrunk from its expression, that the germ of dissolution of our Federal Government is in the constitution of the Federal judiciary; an irresponsible body, working like gravity by night and day, gaining a little today and a little tomorrow, and advancing its noiseless step like a thief over the field of jurisdiction.

The second was made in 1816, when Jefferson was living in Monticello:

Some men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence and deem them like the Ark of the Covenant, too sacred to be touched. They ascribe to the men of the preceding age a wisdom more than human and suppose what they did to be beyond amendment. I knew that age well; it was very like the present, but without the experience of the present; and 40 years of experience in government is worth a century of book-reading; and this they would say for themselves were they to arise from the dead. * * * But I know also that laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind as that becomes more developed, more enlightened, as new discoveries were made, new truths disclosed, and manners and opinions changed with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also and keep pace with the times. We might as well require a man to wear still the coat which fitted him when a boy as civilized society to remain ever under the regiment of their barbarous ancestors.

Between the philosophy of Mr. Williams and the philosophy of Mr. Jefferson, I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I choose that of Mr. Jefferson.

THE RECLAMATION FOLLY

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] over the radio on Saturday, June 15, 1935.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Hon. FRANCIS D. CULKIN, Thirty-second District, New York, over the N. B. C. national hook-up Farm Home Hour, 12:30, Saturday, June 15, 1935:

Fellow citizens, I greatly appreciate the courtesy accorded me today to speak over the National Broadcasting Co.'s national hook-up to the farmers of the Nation. I am indebted to the National Broadcasting Co. for this opportunity and to Mr. Fred Brenckman, the able representative of the National Grange at Washington, who was the bearer of the invitation.

The problem of the farmer today, yesterday, and since the close of the great war has been the problem of surpluses. Congress has legislated to the end that this surplus might be controlled so that the farmer might find a living price for his product. Under the present A. A. A. the policy of control of the surplus was adopted through the medium of legislation that permitted acreage retirement and benefit payment. The purpose of this legislation was to balance production with consumption and to place agriculture on the same plane as industry.

During my service in Congress I have supported all legislation which had this objective for its purpose. Every economist of note assents the proposition that the return to normal times is dependent very largely upon reestablishing the buying power of the farmer. Upon this restoration of buying power to the farmers of the Nation depends the well-being, and indeed the future life, of the industrial States.

During my service in Congress I have given some study to reclamation as a factor in creating surplus crops from which agriculture suffers. As a result of this I have been and am a definite and vigorous foe of the policy of reclamation as at present carried out by the Department of the Interior. I do not wish to be misunderstood on this question, for when opportunity occurred I have invariably supported by my voice and vote legislation which tended to alleviate the conditions of the farmers who are already on these reclaimed areas. I have supported the moratorium on water rentals. I will support any and all measures for the relief of the reclamation farmer. When I oppose further reclamation I am in their corner fighting their battle. I am for and will always support reclamation projects upon which the community life and the normal development of the West and Southwest depends. May I state that I am for the man on the land, both East and West, and for the improvement of his condition? I think I have a national viewpoint on these matters. I hold no brief, however, for the land sharks, boomers, railroad officials, pseudo empire builders, and similar groups who care nothing for the farmer and who are the main driving force in this reclamation folly.

Primarily, let me state that in these United States there are arable acres to the number of 973,000,000. Normally there are in cultivation in continental America approximately 300,000,000 acres. By virtue of the reduction policy of the Agricultural Administration there are now in production approximately 250,000,000 acres, hardly more than one-quarter of the arable lands of the country.

In a laudable attempt to bring agricultural prices up to a parity with industrial prices and to control the surplus the Department of Agriculture last year spent $635,000,000 to take 35,000,000 acres out of production.

The A. A. A. is in charge of crop production under the leadership of Mr. Chester Davis, a sincere and able public official. While he is harnessing the whole power of the Government to the proposition of controlling surplus, the Bureau of Reclamation in the Department of the Interior, at loggerheads and at war with the policies of the Department of Agriculture, has pursued this fatal policy of bringing new lands into production. In this year of our Lord, against the wishes of the farmers who are being destroyed by this uneconomic policy, the pseudo empire builders of the Bureau of Reclamation are starting to bring into production approximately 4,000,000 additional acres of land.

These additional acres will increase the existing surplus, depress prices, and add to the present distress of the farmers. My colleagues from the reclamation States claim that crops raised on reclaimed land amounts to 1 percent of the crop production in America. This, my friends, is a definite fiction. In some fields the increased croppage rises as high as 50 percent. The tables show that 11 percent of the total crops in America are raised on reclaimed lands, every acre of which has been either reclaimed by the Government or on projects fostered and engineered by the Bureau of Reclamation in the Department of the Interior. The commitments last year to reclamation were over $100,000,000. To complete the projects started will take a billion dollars. Much of this money comes from farm States, including Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Ohio. In other words, the Bureau of Reclamation is using the money of the farmers for the purpose of destroying them by added competition. Thus far the farmers have been complacent and passive about this procedure.

Some of the pending projects when put into work will destroy the farmers who are already on the land. Let me illustrate this:

If the 2,000,000 acres of the Grand Coulee, in Washington, is put in work it will unhorse the fruit farmers of the West coast. Already there is a surplus of this type of orchard crop in the West, and we are told that the land of the Grand Coulee is particularly suited to raise fruits. I have opposed the Grand Coulee development for this reason. This project was condemned by the United States Engineers in 1932 as uneconomical either as a reclamation or power project. It has never had the approval of Congress. The Grand Coulee is a vast area of gloomy table lands interspersed with deep gulleys located in northern Washington. The project has been condemned by the National Grange and other agricultural groups in America.

I am in receipt of letters which tell me that the farmers of the State of Washington are becoming alive to the dangers that confront them. I hold in my hand a letter sent to Mr. Fred Breackman, representative of the National Grange at Washington, D. C., from a resident of the State of Washington. This letter recites that the orchard property in Wenatchee-Okanogan district showed an average fixed indebtedness, not including current indebtedness, for growing costs per acre of $599.74. The writer goes on to say:

"This information should be of value to you in your efforts to prevent further irrigation development in the State of Washington. The placing of more lands under irrigation at this time is nothing short of confiscation of the homes and ranches of those people who have already invested their life savings in this State."

I now call as a witness to the dangers of this development a resident of Kennewick, Wash. This writer is well-informed and I read from his letter:

"If we gain a bunch of suckers you lose them and they move out here, and the subsequent disillusionment puts them on the bum for good. You had a plain case of that in the ill-starred Brooklyn caravan when they trekked to Idaho. In our whole national set-up there is no one scandal as rotten as the reclamation delusion. The pitiful feature of this whole mess is that the western irrigation farmer is never allowed to 'catch up.' If the poor fool imagines that he sees daylight a long way ahead, his hopes are dashed by a new political ditch (appropriation grab) starting up somewhere. Our 'Reclamation Service' should be in the Agriculture Department, not the Interior Department."

I have in my files many similar letters from farmers in the State of Washington. It will interest my hearers to know that the United States Engineers estimate that the completed Grand Coulee project will cost $714,000,000, amortized at 4 percent. The farmers of the Nation who are the real creators of its wealth will, therefore, be contributing to their own destruction.

Boulder Dam will bring 1,200,000 acres into production. Some of the reclamation phases of Boulder Dam are sound, as are its provisions for flood control and power. More than half of the acreage, however, will simply add to the existing agricultural surplus, and the man who farms this area will find no market for his crops. Fifty years from now the picture may change, but with immigration stopped and the birth rate falling it is unlikely that this additional land will ever be needed.

I want to emphasize anew that reclamation projects of this type are destructive alike to the farmer who is already on the land and those who settle on these reclaimed areas. When either group brings his crop to the market he is confronted with falling prices that do not give him and his a decent living. Putting these areas into production will further handicap the already grievous situation of the dairymen, for our friends in the Reclamation Bureau are stressing dairying in all their literature. It will destroy the California growers of soft fruit, including pears, peaches, and apricots. It will destroy the Oregon and Idaho farmers by new plantings of apples and potatoes. It will furnish additional and destructive competition to the fruit growers of Virginia, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, the New England States, Ohio, Michigan, and Southern Illinois. These lands will seriously affect the present difficult situation of the wheat farmers in Kansas, Iowa, and Minnesota. It is time that the farmers of the Nation were aroused to their danger. Their leaders in the Grange and other organizations have advised them of this peril and have fought vigorously against the placing of new lands into production. It is time that the people themselves became vocal.

The Bureau of Reclamation should be placed in the Department of Agriculture. Make this the subject of discussion in your Granges and other gatherings. If you do this the future of all farming groups will be more secure. If you do not get into action and stop this mad folly, the present effort of the Department of Agriculture to control the existing surplus will be in vain, and you will pass on to your children and your children's children a continuing heritage of economic distress.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY].

Mr. Speaker, before I proceed to attempt to discuss House Resolution 263, providing for the consideration of the labor-disputes bill, I want to heartily join in the felicitations which have been expressed to the distinguished gentleman from Colorado, our beloved acting majority leader [Mr. TAYLOR] upon the occasion of his seventy-seventh birthday. [Applause.]

He is in much better voice today than I am. I only hope that some of us who may be a generation or more younger than he, when we reach that ripe old age of 77, we shall have had such a distinguished career as he and that we shall be as alert, physically and mentally, as he is today. I congratulate him. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 263 provides for the consideration of the labor-disputes bill, commonly and sometimes profanely referred to as the "Wagner-Connery bill", named after the distinguished junior Senator from my State and that beloved champion of labor, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

I assure you that this rule is not a gag rule. I have been amused at the constant misguided references to gag rules. Only yesterday I read in a Washington newspaper that the A. A. A. amendments bill was being "jammed through the House under a gag rule."

Of course, nothing could be more ridiculous. The A. A. A. and the Wagner-Connery bill would never be considered in this House without a special rule. Rather than the rule for the consideration of the A. A. A. amendments being a gag rule, it was six times more liberal than the usual and ordinary procedure of this House. This rule for the consideration of the Connery bill is three times as liberal as the ordinary procedure of the House. If that is gagging it is at least a pleasant dose. Because if either of these bills were brought up under the ordinary rules of the House there would be only 1 hour's debate, whereas in the triple A bill we provided for 6 hours' debate, and for this bill 3 hours' debate, with every opportunity for amendment and no attempt to restrict the prerogatives of any Member.

For months I have been overwhelmed by countless thousands of letters from all over the country in reference to this bill, most of them from employers apparently alarmed at the prospects of its passage. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts and other supporters of the measure, who know the situation as to this bill, can state to the country, if it really concerns what I had to do with the making of the rule for the consideration of this bill possible.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. COX. I know that the gentleman has been anxious to get a rule for the consideration of this bill, and any assertion that he has been blocking it is untrue.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have been striving for weeks to get this rule reported from the committee so that the House might consider it. From the beginning, despite any statements of irresponsible labor leaders to the contrary, I have been wholeheartedly for the bill.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. I know the situation and I am entirely familiar with it. I am glad to tell the country that the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has done everything in his power to bring out a rule on this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, I am not concerned about scandalous misstatements from irresponsible sources. I have gone through many years of it and I can still take it a little longer.

Mr. HOEPPEL. And, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman may be unjustly accused in reference to the Spanish-American veterans' bill. I know the gentleman was heartily in favor of that bill, and I should like that to be shown in the RECORD.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, I do not care about that either. Everyone who knows what goes on here knows what I did to make the passage of that bill possible.

As I understand it, this labor-disputes bill becomes necessary chiefly because of the Supreme Court decision which disposed of the main part of the N. R. A., including section 7 (a), which provided for the settlement of labor disputes. As I read the bill and study it, what it does principally is to provide for collective bargaining among employees. Employers, through their chambers of commerce and their trade associations, have always had the privilege of collective bargaining; and if N. R. A., if the new deal, has any one outstanding feature, it is the encouragement of collective bargaining among business men, manufacturers, and producers. If collective bargaining under the new deal should fail, the whole new deal would fail. If that right of collective bargaining is accorded to employers, why should it not be granted to employees? That is the spirit of this bill—to give to employees the same right to act in concert that has been granted to employers. Everyone knows that the individual, by himself, is at the mercy of the heartless employers.

What does the bill do? Employees have had the right of collective bargaining, by decisions of the court, since 1842, and this bill merely assures them that they may do that without interference from the employer in their self-organization. Is there anything wrong in that? Does anybody object to that? Of course, some employers do.

All the bill says to the employer is, in effect, "If your employees want to organize, as they have had a right to do for over 90 years, you keep your hands off and let them organize. You bargain collectively. Let them bargain collectively by representatives of their own choosing. They do not choose your representatives. Why should you choose theirs?" Is there anything wrong with that? The employer bargains collectively with representatives of his own choice. He sits in his trade association. He sat in the code meetings. Did he have outside representatives selected by employees or anyone else? No; he had representatives of his own choosing; and all that labor asks is that when they bargain with their employers, they have representatives of their own choosing. Who can complain of that?

This bill is nothing new. The National Industrial Recovery Act contained substantially the spirit of the bill. The N. R. A. provided:

> Employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively—

Is there anything wrong with that?—

> through representatives of their own choosing, and shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers.

Is there anything wrong about that? We merely enunciate an equality of bargaining power.

This bill in its spirit is substantially a reenactment of the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, which this Congress deliberately put into that bill. In the last Congress we gave the railroad employees that exact right—to be free from interference from the employers. We gave them the right to bargain collectively without any interference from the railroad executives. Is there any reason why labor generally should not have the same right as the railroad workers?

Of course, many of the employers would like to keep their self-controlled company unions. Why, the very name "union" is a misnomer. It is a stopgap against any union.

I have heard there have been some objections to the provision that labor, through its representatives, should be entitled to go into the courts although the labor union and although the representatives of the workers are not parties to the suit. What is wrong with that? Why should not labor have the chance to go in and argue collectively the rights of labor in any court action where there is a labor dispute? Why should they not have their own attorneys in the suit?

Mr. Speaker, it is my conviction that there is a lot of undue alarm about this bill among employers and as to what its results will be. It has been my experience in the Legislature of New York, and in this body, that employers, falsely importuned by their lobbyists, by their paid representatives who want to keep their jobs, are deliberately frightened at any suggestion of bettering the conditions of labor. I have a letter here from a man in New York, the same man who fought the workmen's compensation law, the same man who fought improving the hours of labor for women and children in industry, the same man who fought the factory laws, and he is still fighting every labor measure. He holds a job. He is paid to do it and to frighten employees.

It has invariably happened that after those labor laws were put into effect, the employer and business would not be without them. I predict that result as to this bill after it has had time to operate. The employers are unduly alarmed. If there is any injustice in the bill it will be corrected. I have never seen an injustice last very long. Listen to what this paid shouter for the Associated Industries of New York says as to the attitude of the employers of his association toward their Government:

> All employers and all independent self-respecting employees will refuse to submit to the governmental domination which this bill seeks to thrust upon them.

Is this a defiance of law? Of course the employers of my State did not authorize nor do they subscribe to any such defiant attitude toward our Government.

This paid lobbyist would have us believe that the employers whom he falsely represents are serving notice that if we pass the bill they will not submit to it. Of course, they will attack it in the courts. That is their right. Of course, they will put every obstacle in the way of it as they always have done when there has been an attempt to better the condition of wages and of employment. As to that they must answer to themselves and their employees.

There is a lot of talk nowadays about the distribution or the redistribution of wealth. Why, Mr. Speaker, the way to distribute wealth in this country, if it should be better distributed, is to increase wages and individual income. [Applause.]

So I am hopeful that when this bill has been thoroughly considered under the 3 hours' general debate and under the 5-minute rule, many of the alarms, many of these fears which have been set up as straw men by paid representatives of employers will be dissipated, and that this House will come to the conclusion that the enactment of this bill is for the benefit not only of labor, but for the benefit of the employer and every man, woman, and child in this great country of ours. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I have not opposed the bringing in and adoption of any rule to make in order a major proposition of legislation desired by the administration and put on the legislative program of the leadership of the House. I think they are entitled to have their program of legislation, which the administration desires and which the majority of this House desire to further. I think they are entitled to have that legislation considered. Heretofore I have only opposed rules when they contained limitations on the offering of amendments, or otherwise deprived the membership of the House of free and unfettered deliberation under the general rules of the subject matter of the bills proposed. But I cannot vote for, and I must needs oppose, the reporting of this rule and its adoption.

Insofar as the subject matter of this legislation is concerned and its fundamental principles, I am in sympathy with it. I recognize the right of labor to collectively bargain. I am in hearty sympathy with everything that is economically possible to raise wages and better the living conditions of those who work in this country. I believe it is the destiny of this country that its standards of living for the masses of the people and for everybody be continually raised, and I am for anything that will bring that about. So it is not the bill as such that I am opposing; but recently the Constitution of the United States was interpreted by the Supreme Court in a decision that was unanimous, and which opinion I have before me.

I wish to remind the Membership of this House of some of the things that the Constitution contains. I quote from the opinion subscribed to by the entire membership of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court laid down the proposition that the general police powers to be exercised in this country belong to the States, and that insofar as the exercise by the Federal Government of police powers is concerned it is limited to regulation of interstate and foreign commerce. If the exercise of power by the Federal Government is not needed for the regulation of commerce, then the exercise of that power has been prohibited by the Constitution to the Federal Government.

The Supreme Court has said, with respect to activities that affect interstate commerce, this:

> In determining how far the Federal Government may go in controlling intrastate transactions upon the ground that they "affect" interstate commerce, there is a necessary and well-established distinction between direct and indirect effects.

It cited the Coronado and the Bedford Coal Co. against Stonecutters of America cases and said that where the Supreme Court, under the Sherman Act, determined that under the Constitution the Federal Government had the right to interfere with intrastate activities, it was because the Court found as a fact that there existed a conspiracy not to do something that might affect interstate commerce, but a conspiracy to stop interstate commerce directly. It is upon the finding of that fact that the Court found that the cases came within Federal jurisdiction. It must be a direct and not an indirect effect, says the Supreme Court.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. Chief Justice Taft in the Coronado case said:

> If Congress deems certain practices, though really not a part of interstate commerce, likely to obstruct, restrain, or burden it, it has the power to subject them to national supervision or restraint.

That is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The Supreme Court in its decision said that these intrastate activities which interfered with interstate commerce must not only substantially interfere with commerce, but must have interference as a specific purpose. That is what the Supreme Court in the recent decision said.

It goes on:

> But where the effect of intrastate transactions upon interstate commerce is merely indirect, such transactions remain within the domain of State power. If the commerce clause were construed to reach all enterprises and transactions which could be said to have an indirect effect upon interstate commerce, the Federal authority would embrace practically all the activities of the people and the authority of the State over its domestic concerns would exist only by sufferance of the Federal Government.

Furthermore, this is what they said in answer to the question raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts:

> The distinction between direct and indirect effects has been clearly recognized in the application of the Antitrust Act. Where a combination or conspiracy is formed with the intent to restrain interstate commerce or to monopolize any part of it the violation of the statute is clear,—

Citing the Coronado case—

> but where that intent is absent and the objectives are limited to intrastate activities, the fact that there may be an indirect effect upon interstate commerce does not subject the parties to the Federal statute, notwithstanding its broad provisions.

Furthermore, in speaking of the Industrial Association against United States case, it quotes from that opinion as follows:

> The alleged conspiracy and acts here complained of spent their intended and direct force upon a local situation—for building is as essentially local as mining, manufacturing, or growing crops—and if, by resulting diminution of the commercial demand, interstate trade was curtailed, either generally or in specific instances, that was a fortuitous consequence so remote and indirect as plainly to cause it to fall outside the reach of the Sherman Act.

And the Supreme Court goes on further and says that while these decisions were upon the point whether the Antitrust Act was applicable to the cases brought before it, it goes on to say as follows:

> While these decisions related to the application of the Federal statute and not to its constitutional validity, the distinction between direct and indirect effects of intrastate State transactions upon interstate commerce must be recognized as a fundamental one essential to the existence of our constitutional system.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. LEHLBACH. These same rules that were applied in the antitrust cases are applicable in determining the constitutionality of a statute.

The Supreme Court sums up its opinion on this subject in the following language:

> We are of opinion that the attempt, through the provisions of the code, to fix the hours and wages of employees of defendants in their intrastate business was not a valid exercise of the Federal power.

And, as before mentioned, the Court specified as such intrastate business, building, mining, manufacturing, or growing crops.

What does the bill before us propose to do? This bill proposes to set up certain prohibitions against employers. Section 8 states that it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer, any employer, to do one of five things heretofore not illegal. An employer is defined as anyone who pays money for the services of another, and excludes simply the Government of the United States, a State, or political subdivision thereof, any person subject to the Railway Labor Act, any labor organization or any officer or agent of a labor organization. Outside of these groups the pending bill includes everybody employing labor for any purpose throughout the United States, and is manifestly unconstitutional.

The bill provides procedure for the enforcement and restraint of indulgence in these prohibited labor practices. So we have here a situation where a proposed law is not doubtful with respect to its constitutionality, where there can be no reasonable difference of opinion, where it is not a matter of judgment as to whether it is in violation of the Constitution, because the interpreter of the Constitution, set up by that instrument, has spoken in unequivocal language. We have, therefore, the remarkable situation of the legislative and executive branches deliberately and willfully engaged in enacting legislation to vest powers in the administrative branch which powers they know the Constitution says are not within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. It is clear usurpation. It is a determination by the Federal Government to govern in matters which the Constitution states are not within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, matters which the Constitution recites are reserved to the States and the peoples thereof. It is a direct exercise of governmental functions by the Federal Government by main strength and in defiance of the Constitution.

I cannot vote for any such rule, I cannot vote for any such bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended, until a few minutes ago, to have anything whatever to say about the Wagner-Connery bill consideration of which the pending rule is intended to make in order. I recognize, of course, that the bill raises an issue that must at some time be fought out, and I think it may as well be now as any other time. I have not, therefore, opposed the reporting of the rule by the Rules Committee, and do not and will not oppose the adoption of the rule in the House.

I have not had time to digest the bill as fully as I should like, but it must be apparent to everyone who has read it that it carries upon its face the most terrible threat—and I speak deliberately and advisedly—to our dual form of government that has thus far arisen. In this respect it is far more terrible than was the National Recovery Act. It is not what appears upon the face of the bill that disturbs me, it is the intent and purpose carried by the measure which the language used is intended to conceal.

The purpose of the measure, as all honest minds must confess, is to circumvent the effect of the recent ruling of the Supreme Court in the Schechter case. It is intended by this measure through the use of the commerce clause of the Constitution to sap and undermine that great document to the extent of ultimately striking down and destroying completely all State sovereignty. Here the attempt is made through the use of the commerce clause to extend Federal control to the point of production and distribution, which the courts for more than a hundred years have uniformly held to be domestic questions.

If it be not the purpose of the bill to circumvent and to nullify the pronouncements of the Court in the case to which I have referred, then there should be no objection to amending the measure to make it clear that there is no purpose to push Federal control through legislative definitions or otherwise beyond the point fixed by the Court in the Schechter case which defines the limit of congressional power. There is the test of what is here sought to be done; for, of course, no one objects to collective bargaining. I am for insuring to and protecting labor in the free and unrestricted exercise of all their constitutional rights. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, I was profoundly impressed by the very able argument to which we have just listened, offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

I am not a lawyer; in fact, the number of phases of human existence about which I do not know is very large, but I approach this and every other problem from the point of view of the well-being of the man himself, and I find myself deeply disturbed by and strongly opposed both to this rule and to the legislation which it introduces to the House.

Eleven years ago last March I had the honor of addressing this House on the subject of our American economic revolution, and at that time I laid down certain principles by which I interpreted history. To those principles, in which I believe more strongly than ever, I appeal at this time for your consideration.

The end of the social process, as I see it unfolding down through the long weary centuries, is that men may be free. For a thousand years men have fought to be free to think, to be free to worship, to be free to govern themselves. They have won in theory at least those areas of freedom which have to do with intellectual, moral, and political rights.

Today throughout the civilized world the attention of every class in every community is turned to one new objective, namely, that the masses of men shall achieve the same freedom economically that in days gone by they had achieved in the realm of the mind, the spirit, and the political structure. In accomplishing this great objective, which I believe in with all my heart and to which I have devoted the best years of my life, we have a choice between two great instrumentalities. One is the American instrument of private enterprise developed by free American citizens under the Constitution and Government of the United States. The other is the instrumentality adopted in various countries of Europe, in which the Government is everything. It is the monster of control, and under that control the individual lives his life, whether he be employer or employee, shackled and bound by authority forced upon him from above and not created by his own choice. As between these two principles of life I take my stand on and for the American principle, and I am willing to go down with that principle even if I did not get one vote back home. I will stand for that American concept of life to the last ditch at any cost to myself or to my party. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I believe in organized labor. I have voted and fought for almost every principle and every policy introduced in this House in 10 years that had as its purpose the advancement of the workingmen, not because I wanted their votes, although sometimes I needed them. I will be honest with myself and my people even if I am in politics. I would rather go down fighting for the principles that have made this Nation great than to be guaranteed a safe election for the rest of my natural life. I believe those American principles are at stake in this legislation today.

The American instrument for the distribution of wealth is not this body and it is not the White House. It is organized industry, composed of the employer and the employee working together as partners in the greatest material social service the world contains.

Mr. WHITE. I think sometimes industry may be overorganized.

Mr. EATON. I think that is a valuable suggestion. In the old days the individual was the chief instrument of industry. You did not need organized labor. But when we created by law a great, impersonal giant, known as a corporation, it became the duty of Government to follow that legislative creation by proper legal regulation. The day that you introduced that powerful impersonal instrument on the side of the employer, it became necessary for the employees to organize in a mass form, otherwise the individual worker would have had about as much weight as a fly on the wheel of a locomotive. So I have been for organized labor, and I want to see it continue, but I want to see organized labor and organized industry work together as a team in social service, not under the whip of bureaucratic control, but under personal responsibility and in accordance with the fundamental ideals of our country. [Applause.]

Can that be done? I may be an old fogy in my views about that matter, but I have been in the industry of this country, and in the closest intimacy with these problems for the past 20 years, and I do not believe that full and free and friendly cooperation between employer and employee is an idle dream. May I give you two illustrations, and I am sorry that they have to do with the dead. When you go to Cleveland, go out to the Lake View Cemetery, and I hope you will not go there as a patron, but rather as a visitor. You will see a monument at the entrance crowned by the magnificent figure of a man, Henry Chisholm. Many years ago a young Scotchman, who was a carpenter, and his wife were put off a sailing vessel on the wharf in Cleveland. They had all their worldly goods in a box and she sat on the box while he went up town to get a room. He came back and both of them took hold of the box and carried it up to their room. When that man died at the end of a wonderful career in Cleveland he was followed to his grave in the cemetery by 6,000 of his employees and they erected this monument. On it they put this statement:

Erected by 6,000 employees and friends in memory of Henry Chisholm, Christian, philanthropist, and everybody's friend. Born in Lochgelly, Scotland, April 27, 1822. Died in Cleveland, Ohio, May 9, 1881.

That is the essence of the relationship that I believe should exist between employer and employee in every organized industry. I believe it is possible to achieve that normal human relationship if we may have some kind of moral sense and intellectual understanding of our problems, which problems we can never solve by legislation such as is being proposed here today.

Here is the other instance. The employees of Richman Bros., manufacturers of clothing, have hung in the lobby of their East Fifty-fifth Street factory, Cleveland, Ohio, a life-size portrait of their friend and employer, Henry C. Richman, and a bronze tablet, which reads as follows and which does not read very much like the legislation which we are considering here today.

The Richman institution is a successful firm of Jewish people who have been for many years in the clothing business. They are not chiselers, they are not doing a sweatshop business. They are fine American citizens who stand for the very best in all their relations with their employees. This is what the employees put on the tablet:

The memory of the righteous shall be a blessing. This memorial tablet has been erected by the employees of Richman Bros. Co. in loving tribute to Henry C. Richman. June 26, 1876–February 16, 1934. Coworker, friend, benefactor. His interest in the personal welfare of the men and women of "the Richman family" was constant, devoted, and inspiring. He was a gentleman of spirit, generous of heart, strong in integrity, and a friend of us all. His memory will live forever in the grateful hearts of all who knew him, and, knowing him, loved and respected him.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman if he thinks there should be any laws against homicide because there are decent people in the country?

Mr. EATON. I would not expect a question of that magnitude to be asked except on that side of the aisle.

This resolution describes the legislation under consideration as—

A bill to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes.

As I read the bill, the exact opposite of this description would be more in accord with the truth. It destroys equality of bargaining power between employer and employee. And it will increase enormously the causes of labor disputes. It will not cure the disease. It will aggravate and perpetuate the disease.

This legislation strikes a fatal blow at organized labor as we have known it in America. For it plucks the labor union out of the plane of free, self-governing American institutions and places it under the supreme control and domination of a political bureaucracy in Washington.

Under this bill the labor union ceases to function as an economic instrumentality and becomes a mere cog in the vast political bureaucracy now being built up in Washington for the purpose of bringing all American life under Government control and management.

It takes from employers and employees alike their constitutional right to develop their mutual relationships under local conditions and free from bureaucratic political dictation. And it denies the great majority of American workers the right to work under conditions and leaderships of their own choosing.

This and all similar legislation rests upon the absurd proposition that all business men are dishonest and unfair and all employees are incapable of self-determination or self-government. It places the relation of employer and employee upon a permanent and unalterable war basis. It rests upon the false assumption that the interests of employer and employee are by their intrinsic nature absolutely irreconcilable. And it puts the employer in the criminal class, subject to fine and imprisonment for a list of new crimes fastened upon him under legal processes as unjust and unfair as they will certainly turn out to be unconstitutional.

Believing as I do that organized industry is now the chief instrument of civilization, I see small hope for our social future unless employer and employee quit fighting each other and join forces to meet the challenge that confronts them. Under our American system there is only one way to justly distribute wealth, and that is by high wages made possible by high production at low unit cost. Wages and profits must be paid out of production. There is no other source from which they can be derived. And high wages cannot come out of an industry conducted as an armed camp with the vultures of bureaucracy darkening the sky.

The problem of human relationships in industry can never be solved by law, and especially by class legislation which seeks to enthrone one class while it enslaves another. The need of the hour is not more law and more bureaucratic dictators. Our need is an awakened sense of moral obligation among employers and employees and the people generally, which will make fair industrial cooperation possible and leave us all free to act as self-governing, self-respecting American citizens, with faith in ourselves and in each other.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, if a majority of employers would be as fair to their employees as those who have been mentioned by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON], there would be no need for this pending legislation; but, unfortunately, such is not the case. In many instances many honest employers are being misled by propaganda on the part of industry.

I am satisfied that the employers described by the gentleman will not be found among those objecting to this legislation, but they will give it their whole-hearted support and cooperation.

I have in my hand more than 400 letters and telegrams from men protesting against the passage of the bill, and a majority of these men, Mr. Speaker, draw from $50,000 to $100,000 a year in salary as president or as other officers of these corporations. Moreover, many of them draw from $50,000 to $250,000 a year in bonuses. These are the men who are fearful that something will be done that will be helpful and beneficial to the deserving workers of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that if the men who have either wired or written to me had been well informed on this proposed legislation they would not have sent these telegrams and letters; but, unfortunately, the officers of these various manufactories and large corporations, with the organizations and lobbies which they employ, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has stated, to keep their fat jobs, instigate this propaganda. This should be condemned and, for one, I shall continue to resent such activities of these men who are responsible for the thousands of telegrams and letters with which they are endeavoring to influence and browbeat us while we are in the performance of our duties.

As to the constitutionality of this measure, during the 29 years I have been here, every time we have had a bill in the interest of the deserving labor, I have heard the learned lawyers of the Nation raise the question of constitutionality. When I introduced my first bill on workmen's compensation 29 years ago, what a hue and cry was raised against it. The question of its constitutionality was raised then, and, as I have stated, the same question has been raised in every instance with respect to legislation considered on the floor of this House in the interest of the masses and the laboring people of the country.

All this legislation contemplates is the setting up of a labor-relations board that would be helpful in effecting adjustments in disputes among employers and employees. It has been stated, and I know it will be used again on the floor, that the leaders of the American Federation of Labor are dictating this legislation. Some gentlemen resent and give as a reason for opposing this bill the statements of Mr. Green, the president of the American Federation of Labor. Anyway, if this legislation is enacted, it would benefit only about 3,000,000 of the 30,000,000 workers of our country.

Let me say very earnestly to the opponents who are using that as a pretext for opposing this legislation that were it not for the work of the American Federation of Labor, we would still have in this country our workers enslaved 10, 12, and even 14 hours a day at the starvation wage of a dollar a day. The present high status of the workers of America is due to the age-long struggle and accomplishments of, first, the Knights of Labor, and, later, the conservative American Federation of Labor.

The American Federation of Labor has for many years been a benefactor not only of the deserving workers of America but to America herself. That splendid organization, more than any other, has been instrumental in the improvement of living conditions and wages of the labor of this Nation.

If employers and industries have unrestrained right to organize, why should not the same privilege be accorded to the real producers of wealth? Attacks against that splendid organization, the American Federation of Labor, are unfair, unjust, and in many case contemptible.

Anybody who is fair and familiar with the existing condition of labor these distressful times will, if he follows the dictates of his heart and conscience not vote against this generally helpful proposed legislation.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time on this side to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill because it purports to do what it cannot do, and we are therefore grossly deceiving many people who are looking to it for help and protection. This bill purports to assure to workers generally freedom from any interference, restraint, or coercion in the forming or joining of labor organizations and in collective bargaining. If the bill actually goes this far it is manifestly unconstitutional, while if it is limited in its operation to those few isolated cases where Congress may perhaps still legislate with respect to such matters without violating the Constitution, it does not give what it purports to give, or what its sponsors claim for it.

There is some question whether even on the narrowest construction the whole bill is not unconstitutional in the light of the decision of the majority of the Supreme Court a few months ago on the Railway Retirement Act. In that case the court said:

> The purpose of the law is not safety, but to give social security to a limited class. Hence, it is not a necessary or appropriate rule or regulation affecting the due fulfillment of the railways' duty to serve the country in interstate transportation.

The present bill makes a great deal out of the alleged advantage to interstate commerce in the setting up of machinery for collective bargaining. The court might hold that such machinery does not increase the efficiency of interstate commerce and therefore Congress may not legislate with respect to it, irrespective of the nature of the company involved in the labor dispute, i. e., whether it is actually engaged in interstate commerce or not.

It is true that the Supreme Court in the case of Texas & New Orleans Railroad Co. v. Brotherhood (281 U. S. 548) upheld the Railway Labor Act of 1926, in a suit by a labor union to restrain the railroad from interfering with the right of its employees to organize and the designation of representatives for bargaining. The Court in that case, however, distinguished the principle involved from the rules laid down in Adair v. United States (208 U. S. 161) and Coppage v. Kansas (236 U. S. 1), which held unconstitutional statutes directed toward regulating the rights of railroads to employ and discharge employees at will. The Texas case is, therefore, of narrow application and is not necessarily authority for the principle that Congress may legislate on all matters covered in the present bill, if the company involved is engaged in interstate commerce or in transactions so affecting interstate commerce as to be as to some matters under the control of Congress.

Another aspect of the case which should be given at least passing consideration is the question of discrimination. If relations between employers and employees are to be regulated, a serious constitutional question is raised if employers are forbidden to do certain things and employees are not so forbidden. It is possible that the Supreme Court might consider this an arbitrary, unreasonable, or capricious use of power by Congress and therefore violative of the due-process clause of the Constitution.

But even if neither of these two possible constitutional objections to the bill are involved, the effect of its operation is so narrow that only in isolated cases of labor disputes could it be invoked. The great mass of labor disputes in the country are, of course, in manufacturing, in the production of raw materials, or in the supplying of services. None of these, outside of the communications industry or the transportation industry, could possibly come under the terms of the act. The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that the business of manufacturing, the business of mining, and the business of supplying intrastate services cannot be held to be in interstate commerce unless the effect on interstate commerce is direct and substantial. The Schechter case, decided on May 27, is, of course, the most recent enunciation of this doctrine. The Supreme Court could have decided that case solely on the question of delegation of authority, but went out of its way to discuss the interstate commerce question, realizing, undoubtedly, that it was well to warn Congress of the limits beyond which it could not go.

The Court asked in its opinion: "Did the defendant's transactions directly 'affect' interstate commerce so as to be subject to Federal regulation?" and then answered its own question as follows:

> In determining how far the Federal Government may go in controlling intrastate transactions upon the ground that they "affect" interstate commerce, there is a necessary and well-established distinction between direct and indirect effects. * * * But where the effect of intrastate transactions upon interstate commerce is merely indirect, such transactions remain within the domain of State power. If the commerce clause were construed to reach all enterprises and transactions which could be said to have an indirect effect upon interstate commerce, the Federal authority would embrace practically all the activities of the people, and the authority of the State over its domestic concerns would exist only by sufferance of the Federal Government.

When proponents of the bill before us are asked for any evidence that Congress has the power to control labor relations in ordinary business, they customarily point to the language of Chief Justice Taft in the First Coronado case (259 U. S. 344), as follows:

> If Congress deems certain recurring practices, although not really part of interstate commerce, likely to obstruct, restrain, or burden it, it has power to subject them to national supervision or restraint.

But in the Schechter case the Supreme Court specifically referred to the Coronado cases and pointed out that in those cases there was a combination or conspiracy with the intent of restraining interstate commerce, and that therefore the Antitrust Act was violated. The Court continued:

> But where that intent is absent and the objectives are limited to intrastate activities, the fact that there may be an indirect effect upon interstate commerce does not subject the parties to the Federal statute notwithstanding its broad provisions.

The use of Chief Justice Taft's words in the Coronado case as authority for legislation like the present bill is an example of what Justice Sutherland warned against in the Humphreys case, decided on May 27, last (Rathbun, Executor, v. The United States), when he quoted Chief Justice Marshall in Cohens v. Virginia (6 Wheat. 264), as follows:

> It is a maxim not to be disregarded that general expressions, in every opinion, are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case they may be respected but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit when the very point is presented for decision. The reason of this maxim is obvious. The question actually before the Court is investigated with care, and considered in its full extent. Other principles may serve to illustrate it, are considered in their relation to the case decided, but their possible bearing on all other cases is seldom completely investigated.

Proponents of this legislation also cite Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen (262 U. S. 1), and similar cases, as authority for the right of Congress to pass such legislation. But the peculiar authority of that line of cases is also distinguished in the Schechter case, where the court says:

> Hence decisions which deal with a stream of interstate commerce—where goods come to rest within a State temporarily, and are later to go forward in interstate commerce—and with the regulations or transactions involved in that practical continuity of movement, are not applicable here.

As a matter of fact this legislation shows a callous disregard of the repeated warnings which the Supreme Court has given. It is an outrage to labor to promise what the sponsors of this bill have promised only to find within a year or two, when labor disputes where this act will be invoked finally reach the court of last resort, that Congress went beyond its powers in attempting to include such disputes in this legislation. It is inconceivable that the sponsors of this bill have had proper legal advice, for I am sure that they would not knowingly so mislead their followers.

Is it not wiser to draft legislation on sound legal principles, legislation which can be upheld, rather than arbitrarily pass a bill which has no chance of ultimate validity? The whole tendency of this legislation will be to foment labor trouble, and the heartburnings and disappointments which will ensue when it is found unworkable cannot help but react severely on the whole industrial situation. If we pass this act we are selling labor a gold brick.

What is most desired is friendly relations between capital and labor. Proper wages, hours, and working conditions on the one side, and an ability to earn a reasonable return on the investment on the other. Legislation of this kind, far from accomplishing that desired result, will result only in estranging still further the relations between labor and the employer. The utter futility of the effort to improve conditions by such unsound measures as this should be manifest.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The Supreme Court has said time and again, in the Coronado case and in the Stonecutters case, that anything that affects interstate commerce, as far as a labor dispute is concerned, which burdens or obstructs interstate commerce, can be regulated under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman is entirely incorrect. The gentleman has quoted the Coronado case and that case is generally quoted by those who sponsor legislation of this sort. The gentleman is thinking of the words of Mr. Chief Justice Taft in that case where he used some general language in discussing solely the question of a conspiracy to stop the flow of interstate commerce, and which has been repeatedly held had nothing whatever to do with anything but the particular case of conspiracy. Both the Coronado cases and the so-called "Stonecutters case", to which the gentleman has referred, dealt with conspiracies and combinations in restraint of trade. If the gentleman will look at the decision of Mr. Justice Sutherland in the Humphreys case, he will see that the Justice pointed out how unwise it is to pick out a part of a decision which is obiter dicta, and has specific reference only to the particular case, and then apply such general remarks to other matters of legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD].

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, it seems that we are being confused over the real object of the bill. We are taking a lot of trouble to find where the act might be unconstitutional. The whole object of the bill, the only object, and the object we should not lose sight of is that in this concentrated business of collective bargaining on the part of business we should also have collective bargaining on the part of the employee.

It is the old war of labor over again.

My correspondence files are full of letters saying that by this bill you will turn over industry to the employees, that by this bill the American Federation of Labor or some labor organization will control industry. Under this bill it is impossible for any labor organization to control anything except the selection of its representatives.

There is not a thing in this bill to provide control, nothing in this act provides for it. Under this bill labor has the right to go to the door of the employer and say, "We are ready to sit around the table and argue this matter out and reason it out with you. If we can reach an adjustment, all well and good; if we cannot, we go back to the old system of dog eat dog, which we have had before."

This bill does not adjust labor disputes; it puts both sides in a position where they can adjust them.

There is much talk about the agitators; and some of you gentlemen who are interested in industry, if you think, you would find that the best way you have of eliminating the agitator and the fighter of your labor organization is through this bill.

The agitator and the fighter was brought into the labor organizations because of one thing—and that is that your industrial leaders would not recognize the right of collective bargaining. Your industrial leaders said, "We will not recognize that right." Then came the labor agitator and the strikes. In the last 6 months of 1934, according to the records of the Labor Relations Board, 74 percent of all strikes owed their origin to a demand for collective bargaining.

Thirty-five years ago that was the type of leader you had. Today you have the reasoning type, because many have recognized the right of collective bargaining. The standard labor organizations have eliminated the agitator, and today they are sitting around the table.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Is there anything in this bill to prevent an operator from closing his plant?

Mr. GRISWOLD. There is nothing in the bill to keep an operator from closing his plant. There is nothing in the bill that says you shall reach an agreement—nothing of that sort. It simply provides that labor may bargain collectively. The bill does not fix hours, wages, or working conditions, nor does it allow any Government agency to do so. The bill does not require any employee to join any labor organization. Nothing in the bill compels any employer to make any agreement about anything pertaining to wages, hours, or working conditions in any plant any place.

The bill does provide the manner and method by which employees may select their representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining. Beyond this the bill does not go.

Gentlemen here say they favor the principle of collective bargaining, but they oppose the only means by which collective bargaining can be established. It is like saying, "We believe you should be free, but try and get free."

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. We will agree with that. We all have been for labor for all these years, but we find in this bill an inhibition on the employer to have any such operation as a lock-out, while we find in the winding up of the bill there is nothing to interfere with strikes. Why cannot we get them together and have no lock-outs and no strikes? Otherwise you will have nothing but strikes.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I would be pleased if the gentleman could in some way fix this bill so that we could reach the millennium, a system of brotherhood, so that we would have neither lock-outs nor strikes.

Mr. FOCHT. Why, they have been claiming the millennium on the gentleman's side all of these weeks and months, and by this time you ought to have it worked out.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I suggest to the gentleman that if we have 12 years to work it out, as the gentleman's side did, we will certainly make a better success of it than his side has. [Laughter and applause.]

To get back to the bill. The only inhibition against the employer is that he shall not dominate an organization of his employees. He cannot rent a hall or make a contribution to a union. And this applies whether the union be an American Federation union, a company union, a fraternal brotherhood of employees, or a mugwump union. He cannot buy candy for company-union members nor at his own expense throw a dance for the daughters, and in return expect to get a lengthening of hours or reduction of pay.

And last, but important, domestic and farm labor is specifically exempt.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I trust this rule will be adopted and that this bill will become legislation. It is one of the principal measures of the administration program. It recognizes the right of labor to form unions and have collective bargaining by representatives of their own choosing. It recognizes equality around the conference table, not only of the corporation which is a creature of the law to be represented, but also for labor to be likewise represented by organization and by their representatives. It recognizes not only the theory of collective bargaining, but it goes further and provides that where collective bargaining exists there should also be collective responsibility. In dealing with a group of laboring men you deal with representatives of their own choosing, and, when an agreement is reached, you have then an agency set up whereby you can go to that organization through their representatives and insist on the agreement being kept. This is being done with the railroads. It has been done in the coal-mining operations through the United Mine Workers, who have entered into agreements for periods as long as 3 years. I have known instances where local unions would attempt to interpret the contracts themselves, but the leaders and officers of that union would go to that local union and show wherein they were in error, that they had no right to offer an interpretation over their organization, and they were made to go back to work because they were in error. If we are going to deal with labor on the basis of equality, then it must be through a responsible organization with the leaders of their own choosing. Then, when an agreement is reached, you have an agency set up whereby it can be enforced.

There is nothing, in my opinion, in this bill which will destroy State sovereignty. There are certain problems which we all recognize are Nation-wide and which must be dealt with, not according to State lines but according to national lines. If the States could solve these problems of strikes and lock-outs and controversies in industry, which are more than State-wide, they would have done it. They have had an opportunity for all these many years to set up such an agency, but we all know that these controversies are national in character. The agency set up in this bill will preserve rights of both labor and capital. It will assist without compulsion the amicable adjustment of labor disputes. These controversies are Nation-wide in effect, and society has rights of commerce to be protected and preserved. The general results of this measure will promote economic peace and security. As the railroad labor disputes bill has preserved peace and mutual understanding in rail transportation, this measure will extend better understanding to other industries that affect commerce generally. The bill is a step in the right direction. It possesses a procedure for equity and better labor relations.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1958, to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1958, with Mr. ARNOLD in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, while in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that all members who speak in Committee have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and I give notice that I shall make a similar request for all Members when we get back in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to myself. First of all, I want to make it clear to the House that under the rule whereby we have 3 hours' general debate, which would give Mr. WELCH, of California, the ranking Republican member of the Labor Committee, an hour and a half on his side and an hour and a half on our side, to be controlled by myself, we have reached an agreement to divide up the time equally between the proponents and opponents of the bill.

The whole story in this bill from our viewpoint, from the point of view of the Committee on Labor, and the point of view of the Senate when it passed the bill, is to bring about industrial peace, peace between capital and labor.

All the propaganda that has been aroused against this bill, which you have been receiving in your mail, in your telegrams, attempts to set up a smoke screen that the passage of this bill will mean strikes; that it will mean unrest; that it will turn over business to the American Federation of Labor; that it will turn the country over to the labor unions of the United States.

Nothing could be further from the truth. What this bill means to do, and what the members of the Committee on Labor believe it will do, will be to stop strikes; it will stop unrest; it will stop labor disputes in the United States.

Two years ago, when we passed the National Industrial Recover Act, we passed section 7 (a) as a part of that bill. There was not any fight on section 7 (a) either in the House or in the Senate.

It passed by a great majority. Section 7 (a) set out the rights of labor to bargain collectively, through representatives of their own choosing. All the Wagner-Connery bill, which is before you today, does is to see that this Board which had the enforcing of section 7 (a) is given the power to enforce what we wrote into that section when we passed the N. I. R. A. bill in this House.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TARVER. The National Industrial Recovery Act has been extended except with regard to the provision for the enforcement of codes. If all this provides is an extension of 7 (a), why is it not taken care of in the extension?

Mr. CONNERY. I did not say that that is all it was. I said this gives the Board the power to enforce what we wrote into section 7 (a) when we wrote the National Industrial Recovery Act.

Under section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and Resolution No. 44 that was passed in the closing days of the last session of Congress, presumably this Board had the power to do something about these labor disputes. They would come in, make a decision, what we think was a fair and just decision—for instance, in the automobile case, in the shoe case, in the textile case, and different cases which came to their attention—but that is all they could do. They could just come in and make an investigation, but they had no power of enforcement, because Resolution No. 44 was innocuous; it had no teeth; it did not give them any power. So much so that all they could do was to turn over the results of their investigation to the Department of Justice or to the N. R. A. Compliance Board. The Department of Justice would have to start in all over again, get new evidence, start the case all over again, and then proceed.

In 3 years we have only had four cases of noncompliance with this resolution brought up before the courts of the United States, and no decision on any of them as yet. All that the N. R. A. Board could do was to take away the Blue Eagle, and that meant practically nothing to offenders. So that all we are asking by this bill is to guarantee to labor the same rights that we gave them in section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, namely, the power to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. That power to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing has been upheld time and time again by the Supreme Court in its constitutional aspects. As far as the constitutional aspect of this bill is concerned, there is the Coronado case and there is the Bedford Stonecutters' case. We have heard a lot of talk about intrastate commerce and interstate commerce.

First of all in the Coronado case, the coal was not even mined, it had not started to be mined, it had not gotten to the surface, it was still in the mine, and had not begun its interstate-commerce journey, and they had a strike in the mine, and the Federal court issued an injunction against the district leaders of that union who struck in that mine, and under the antitrust laws they said, "You have no right to strike in that mine. We are issuing an injunction against your striking, because by this strike you are burdening interstate commerce, you are interfering with the free flow of interstate commerce."

In the Bedford Stonecutters' case there was a stone quarry in Indiana. The stone was shipped to New York. It was dumped on the ground. Interstate commerce had ended apparently. The workers who were to put up the building with that stone in New York said, "We will not work on it because it came from a nonunion quarry in Indiana." The court issued an injunction against the leaders of that strike and said, "You cannot strike. Your strike is illegal. It is unlawful, because by striking you are interfering with the free flow of interstate commerce. You are obstructing interstate commerce."

The Wagner-Connery bill is built upon those decisions of the Supreme Court which say that a labor dispute, a strike which interferes with the free flow of interstate commerce, is subject to regulation by the Congress of the United States under its interstate-commerce powers. So we do not have any worries or any fears about the constitutionality of this bill.

There are certain unfair labor practices set out in this bill, saying that it shall be unlawful for the employer to finance any union. That does not mean just a company union. It means any union. It means the American Federation of Labor union or any other union that we can think of. It stops him from interfering with his workers in their rights to bargain collectively. I will just read those provisions. They are short:

SEC. 8. It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7.

(2) To dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it: Provided, That subject to rules and regulations made and published by the Board pursuant to section 6 (a), an employer shall not be prohibited from permitting employees to confer with him during working hours without loss of time or pay.

(3) By discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization: Provided, That nothing in this act, or in the National Industrial Recovery Act (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 15, secs. 701–712), as amended from time to time, or in any code or agreement approved or prescribed thereunder, or in any other statute of the United States, shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in this act as an unfair labor practice) to require as a condition of employment membership therein, if such labor organization is the representative of the employees as provided in section 9 (a), in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made.

(4) To discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under this act.

(5) To refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 9 (a).

Those are the unfair labor practices. As my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], said in his brilliant speech today, what about the national trade associations? The employers' associations—they can bargain collectively among themselves. Nobody steps in and says that they cannot organize. Nobody stepped in when they came down to write the codes of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and said to them that they had no right to organize and bring all their tradesmen down, their representatives of their organizations, to fix prices and take care of their own interests, and in those codes exploit the workers. No indeed! Antitrust acts did not apply to them. The antitrust laws were only invoked to enjoin workers from striking on the grounds that they were interfering with the free flow of interstate commerce. Well, what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and it is about time that we begin to realize that labor disputes do not originate with the workers but 99 times out of 100 begin by the employer exploiting his workers by starvation wages and long, inhuman hours of work.

Nobody raised a finger against that, but when labor comes in and says that all we want is the right to go into a booth in a factory and, with no interference by an employer, with no interference by our foreman, write down on a piece of paper whether we want a union of our own choosing, whether we want a company union, whether we want no union at all, that is a different matter. A great cry goes up that we are oppressing the employees.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I promised to yield first to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER]. Then I shall be pleased to yield to my friend from Ohio.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. TARVER. I am sincerely desirous of ascertaining the gentleman's position. As I understand it, the gentleman takes the position that strikes interfere with interstate commerce; therefore, anything which has a tendency to bring about a strike is proper subject for congressional legislation. That would include disputes about hours of labor, wages, and working conditions, things which the Supreme Court has just expressly said in the Schechter case we cannot regulate in an intrastate industry such as manufacturing. The gentleman's position, therefore, is necessarily directly opposed to the decision of the Supreme Court in the Schechter case.

Mr. CONNERY. No; I do not agree with the gentleman. The Supreme Court has said time and time again, not in 5-to-4 decisions, not in any other close decision, but by unanimous decisions that labor disputes which interfere with interstate commerce are subject to regulation by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. TARVER. And in the Schechter case the Supreme Court cited the Coronado Mining case which the gentleman from Massachusetts has made his leading case, and pointed out that the reasoning of the Coronado decision could not be used to justify an attempt by Congress to regulate conditions of employment in manufacture, mining, or any other intrastate business.

Mr. CONNERY. But I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Schechter case dealt entirely with intrastate commerce. We are dealing in the bill before us with interstate commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. It has been the practice of employers to bring in thugs, gunmen, and strikebreakers to stop strikes.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is there anything in this legislation which will prevent them from bringing in strikebreakers?

Mr. CONNERY. I do not think there is. The employers' rights under the law will be just as strong and secure after the passage of this act as they were before. There are State laws as well as another Federal law which we passed last year to punish thugs and others who come in to break strikes unlawfully.

The gentleman and I may be entirely opposed to calling out the National Guard, but there is nothing in the bill that will stop calling out the National Guard, there is nothing in the bill that will stop employers from bringing in thugs, as I interpret the measure; but the employer may not finance a union, he may not interfere with the formation of a union, may not fire a man because he organizes a union or joins a union; and the employer cannot do as the

New England Telephone & Telegraph Co. did when it brought 30 or 40 girls to testify at a code hearing in the old House Office Building here in Washington, paying their expenses in hotels here, and bringing them before the code hearing to break up a lawful union of girls who had given their time and their best honest efforts to the formation of a union seeking decent hours and decent wages.

The New England Telephone & Telegraph Co. brought these company-union girls before the code hearing to say how much they loved the New England Telephone Co., how nice the company was to them, that it took them on picnics and gave them a nice trip to Washington, but they did not say anything about how low their wages were and how long their hours at the switchboard were.

We are trying to give to the men and women of the United States the right to be free American citizens, to go about and say, "I am master of my soul, I am not an industrial slave. I do not have to stand for any employer hiring a stool pigeon to work alongside of me to break up my union, and I am free to organize to get decent living wages to take care of my wife and my children." That is what this bill is for.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, there have been cases where employers have brought outsiders, strikebreakers, and thugs in to foment strikes in competitors' plants.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; provocateurs, as the French call them.

Mr. FLETCHER. Likewise, they bring in men from the outside and allow them to destroy their own property and stir up their own men to strike.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is there anything in this bill that will stop such practices?

Mr. CONNERY. I do not think there is, directly or indirectly, but there is on the Federal statute books an act for the protection of commerce from that sort of interference, which was enacted on June 18, 1934. Among other things, that act states:

That the term "trade or commerce", as used herein, is defined to mean trade or commerce between any State, with foreign nations, in the District of Columbia, in any Territory of the United States, between any such Territory or the District of Columbia, and any State or other Territory, and all other trade or commerce over which the United States has constitutional jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. Any person who, in connection with or in relation to any act in any way or in any degree affecting trade or commerce or any article or commodity moving or about to move in trade or commerce—

(a) Obtains or attempts to obtain, by the use of or attempt to use or threat to use force, violence, or coercion, the payment of money or other valuable considerations, or the purchase or rental of property or protective services, not including, however, the payment of wages by a bona fide employer to a bona fide employee; or

(b) Obtains the property of another, with his consent, induced by wrongful use of force or fear, or under color of official right; or

(c) Commits or threatens to commit an act of physical violence or physical injury to a person or property in furtherance of a plan or purpose to violate sections (a) or (b); or

(d) Conspires or acts concertedly with any other person or persons to commit any of the foregoing acts; shall, upon conviction thereof, be guilty of a felony and shall be punished by imprisonment from 1 to 10 years or by a fine of $10,000, or both.

SEC. 3. (a) As used in this act the term "wrongful" means in violation of the criminal laws of the United States or of any State or Territory.

(b) The terms "property", "money", or "valuable considerations", used herein shall not be deemed to include wages paid by a bona fide employer to a bona fide employee.

SEC. 4. Prosecutions under this act shall be commenced only upon the express direction of the Attorney General of the United States.

SEC. 5. If any provisions of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 6. Any person charged with violating this act may be prosecuted in any district in which any part of the offense has been committed by him or by his actual associates participating with him in the offense or by his fellow conspirators: Provided, That no court of the United States shall construe or apply any of the provisions of this act in such manner as to impair, diminish, or in any manner affect the rights of bona fide labor organizations in lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof, as such rights are expressed in existing statutes of the United States.

That statute takes care of such situations.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman just said that he did not think in the case of employers adopting the practice of bringing in thugs and gunmen to foment strikes this law would act as a deterrent, but I would remind the gentleman that such acts under this law would be construed as unfair labor practices.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; that is what I meant by an indirect remedy. I think that would be considered an unfair labor practice.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. I know the gentleman is thoroughly familiar with this bill. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will give me the actual mechanics of the bill in connection with its operation. Assume that down in my State, Tennessee, we have a disagreement with organized labor. We will take the case of a little man operating a factory, say, with 50 workmen and they have a disagreement. Perhaps I should grasp this, but I have not been able to get it. Will the gentleman tell me just what the steps would be, assuming that they disagreed?

Mr. CONNERY. First of all, let us assume that my friend from Tennessee is the boss and I am the employee. I want to form a union of the men working in your factory. I start on this and get all the boys together and we form a union. We ask you to let us have an election day to form this union. You say: "No, I will not let you do that." Right away I have a remedy. I go to the National Labor Relations Board. They call you in and say: "Will you not allow these men to have an election free from interference?" You say, "No." They say, "Very well. We order you to have an election." That is the first thing. Then you say: "I am not going to pay any attention to that." Then the board petitions the Federal circuit court of appeals and tells them: "This employer will not agree to have an election." The court then orders you to hold an election, and if you do not comply with their order the court cites you for contempt.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. The gentleman does not get what is in my mind. We will assume that the men are organized and that this is a going concern. Let us assume the union is already perfected and organized and that they fail to agree on a wage scale among themselves.

Mr. CONNERY. Fifty-one percent of the membership are sufficient to carry a plan. The representatives of those men will deal with the employer collectively. They sit down with you and deal with you collectively across the table.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. I should like the gentleman to understand the situation.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman may say: "I will not give you the 10 cents an hour increase you ask." There is nothing they can do then. Nobody asks that you be made to give them the 10 cents an hour. This bill just compels you to deal with the men collectively. You must sit across the table and talk things over with them.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Could they shut down the mill during the time the negotiations were going on?

Mr. CONNERY. No; unless they went on strike. Or they could keep working.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Is it necessary to come next to Washington before this Labor Board or is there some jurisdiction down there?

Mr. CONNERY. They will have separate subsidiary boards situated in the gentleman's State and all over the country.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Is it contemplated in this bill that these things may be adjudicated in our respective States with a last appeal filed here before the Labor Board in Washington?

Mr. CONNERY. You can do that anyway. There is a conciliation department in the Department of Labor and their job is to go down there and fix things up without going to the National Labor Relations Board at all. This bill only applies where some employer says: "I will not deal with the employees" or, "I am going to fire this man because he tried to organize my plant", or for the violation of any one of these unfair labor practices. The conciliation department of the Department of Labor is an entirely separate organization. In the case of disagreement they would go in and try to fix up the trouble with your employees.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. This would be done locally?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not want to be understood by my question as opposing this bill, because I am in favor of it, and I am in favor of laboring people. I have received a great many letters from employers in western Maine who beg me not to support this bill. Can the gentleman give me a reason or two why they should logically ask me to oppose this bill?

Mr. CONNERY. I can give my friend from Maine plenty of reasons. One of the reasons is the natural desire of a man who is an employer and who makes a lot of money allowing the power to go to his head. He will say, "I will do this if I feel like doing it, but nobody is going to tell me how to run my business. They are not going to interfere with my business"; yet he will go down to his trade association and insist that the majority must rule in anything which is for his interest. If there is only a difference of 1 vote, the majority must rule in reference to his interest. I could tell my friend many other reasons why employers selfishly oppose this bill but my time for debate is short.

Mr. Chairman, I have dealt with employers and employees. I have been an employer myself. I ran my own theater at one time and I hired men. I hired actors, actresses, orchestras, and stage hands. I had them work for me. I have been employed in the factory of one of America's best-known corporations, the General Electric Co., as well, so I think I can see both sides of the question. When labor is spoken of in this bill, we are not talking about the American Federation of Labor or any other particular union. We are talking about all the working people of the country. We say that we want all workers to have the right to bargain collectively. We want them to have the right to go to the employer and ask: "Do you not think we ought to get this wage?" We do not want the employer to be able to fire a man because he stands up and says: "Let us get together for our own protection and for the protection of our families, to get short hours and decent wages. Let us form a union." That is all there is in this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. I know of no one who objects to the principle of collective bargaining as the gentleman has announced, but there is something in here I should like to ask the gentleman about because he knows more about this matter than anyone else. I am reading now from subsection 3 of section 2 on page 3:

> The term employee shall include any employee and shall not be limited to the employees of any particular employer.

Mr. CONNERY. I know what the gentleman means.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Does that mean that every man on a pay roll has it within his own right or privilege to join whatever labor union he wants to at that plant?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. Let us take the case of a machinists' union. One employer on this side of the street has a machinists' union and the man across the street has a machinists' union and the man in your factory and the man across the street belong to one union.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Let us go a step further. Suppose in Lynn, Mass., they had 10 cotton mills, 1 being an Anderson mill, another Equinox mill, and so on down the line. Suppose that the employees of one drove a pretty good bargain with their employer and the employees of the other establishments did not drive such a good bargain with their employers. When it got around to the final analysis all of them had driven a bargain and there would appear to be a differential in the wages of about 40 percent.

Does the Board have the right to adjust that difference among those men by making all the employers one group and all the employees of the several mills another group?

Mr. CONNERY. No; the employees can go into any organization they want. If you are an employer and the men in your plant want to form a union and call it the "National Union" and deal with you, they can do so and have nothing to do with any organization outside. If on the other hand they want to join a machinists' union in your plant and affiliate with another union connected with the American Federation of Labor, they can do that.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. If that unit wishes to bargain with the employer, they would be tied up with the American Federation of Labor who would name the man to go in there and also that same department in another plant would be tied up with the American Federation of Labor and so on with respect to all 10 plants in Lynn, Mass.

Mr. CONNERY. They would all belong to one big union; but, of course, your wages would be the same in each plant, because the federation, through its representatives by collective bargaining, would insist on that equality for all the plants doing the same kind of work.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. This bill provides that the employer can have nothing to do with the union. Beginning at the top scale of the pay roll, at what point would you segregate them and say to one that he belongs to the employer class and to another that he belongs to the employee class?

Mr. CONNERY. They have not had any difficulty about that in any of the boards. The Federal Trade Commission or any other Federal board never had any trouble finding out who was an employer or an employee.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Does the man in the boiler room or on the yard, however insignificant his job may be, have the right, in his own right, to join a union so that the boys on the inside cannot ballot against him and keep him out?

Mr. CONNERY. Of course, he will have his chance to go in and vote with all the rest of the people in the plant. The Board can declare what unit is the unit in that plant.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. That is not the point I have in mind right now. Can every individual on that pay roll, it makes no difference who he is, demand the right to go in and join a particular union in that plant?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. And none of his fellow workmen can keep him out?

Mr. CONNERY. They cannot interfere with him at all. We have had a practical sample of that in the case of the General Electric Co. in Lynn. They had an election of that sort, and they do not belong to the American Federation of Labor, and they have their own union.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. WOOD. They have the right to join the union; but if the rest of the employees in that plant form an organization, they do not have to take that man in if they do not want to.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. That is what I was trying to get at.

Mr. WOOD. No more than they would have to do so in the present situation. This bill does not compel any group to take in somebody they do not want to take in.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. What would become of that man? If the majority group should establish a closed-shop agreement with the employer, what would become of this man who knocked at the door and could not get in?

Mr. CONNERY. He can get in.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. The gentleman from Missouri says he cannot.

Mr. CONNERY. There is nothing to keep him out. For instance, in the case I have referred to, they had three or four different questions on the ballot: Do you want an independent union, do you want a company union, do you want this or that, and they voted without any interference from the employers or anybody else. They voted in this case for an independent union of their own. They had, I think, 80 or 90 percent of the plant who voted to come into the union and the representatives which this 90 percent elected do the collective bargaining with the company.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. I understand that.

Mr. CONNERY. I do not think you need worry about that situation. The man to whom you refer would join the union and even if he did not he would get union wages, because the men bargaining collectively would bargain for everyone in the plant.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. I want to know what becomes of the individual who goes up to the union and knocks and says, "I want to become a member", and they ballot among themselves and say he cannot become a member. This being the majority group, they go out to the office and bargain with the employer and effect a closed-shop agreement and then this man who is denied membership, in effect, is legislated out of employment by this bill.

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, no; I do not agree with the gentleman about that. In the first place, the man would join the union, and, second, no employer can be forced to make a closed-shop agreement.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Will you indulge me a little further?

Mr. CONNERY. I should like to, but I have all these other colleagues to whom I should like to yield and I am afraid I am taking up too much time.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The object of collective bargaining, of course, is to reach an agreement. Is there anything in this bill which would make it possible to enforce an agreement as to either party to a controversy?

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman means in the bargaining itself? In other words, can you make the employer give an increase in wages?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Yes; or can you bind the employee?

Mr. CONNERY. No.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute, and may I make this statement to my colleague to clarify the situation? I have 45 minutes for those who are in favor of this bill and 45 minutes for those who are against the bill. I have consumed 28 minutes. It is not fair to my colleagues who want to talk on this bill for me to use further time. I should love to talk with you for an hour, but it would not be fair to my colleagues. Under the 5-minute rule I shall try to yield further.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. EKWALL. Under this bill is it not a fact that they can still have company unions not affiliated with any other union?

Mr. CONNERY. If the employees want to have a company union in any plant and they vote for a company union, they can have it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 more minute.

Mr. EKWALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. EKWALL. Suppose 51 percent of the employees go into the American Federation of Labor and 51 percent vote to go on a strike, does that affect the other 49 percent?

Mr. CONNERY. You are not dealing with strikes in this bill you are dealing with adjustments to prevent strikes.

Mr. EKWALL. Most of the letters that I receive from employers claim that it will make more strikes, and I would like to have your view as to this because this is a most important consideration.

Mr. CONNERY. Well, they are crying before they are hurt, and I believe in a few years they will feel that the best thing that ever happened to them was the passage of this bill to do away with strikes and labor disputes.

Mr. HARTLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. HARTLEY. I am in favor of section 7 of this act, but I want to ask the gentleman a question. Section 8 says that it shall be unfair labor practice to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the right guaranteed in section 7.

Mr. CONNERY. I know what my friend is going to say. If you accept the Tydings amendment you might as well throw this bill out of the window. Some courts have interpreted the word "coerce" in labor disputes so that you cannot ask a man to join a union, you cannot say that he shall join a union, you cannot threaten to strike, you cannot picket, you cannot circularize banners, you can hardly breathe. That is the weapon of the strike breaker, the weapon of the selfish employer that Congress outlawed in the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

Mr. HALLECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman from Tennessee referred to a factory employing 50 people, manufacturing a product sold entirely within the confines of Tennessee. Is it the idea of the gentleman that this act would assume jurisdiction in such a case?

Mr. CONNERY. I doubt whether the Board could go in there unless it affected interstate commerce.

Mr. HALLECK. Why does not the bill provide for that?

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOTT. Why do you not state in the bill that this shall only apply to interstate commerce?

Mr. CONNERY. Because the court is to decide as to where commerce begins and ends and just what affects commerce, and decide each case on the facts of that case.

Mr. MOTT. If you take out the preamble of the bill there is no limitation of jurisdiction, nothing about interstate commerce, and nothing about industry that affects interstate commerce.

Mr. CONNERY. I think the gentleman will find two or three places in the bill where commerce is directly mentioned. On page 7, subsection 7, the term "affecting commerce" is particularly defined.

Mr. MOTT. Not in a way that will limit it to interstate commerce.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Section 9 of the bill provides that—

Whenever a question affecting commerce arises concerning the representation of employees—

And so forth.

Mr. MOTT. What has that to do with unfair practices? If you do not intend to make it universal, why not limit it in language?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in section 6, page 6, commerce is defined as "commerce between the States", and on page 7 we find the language:

Labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce—

And so forth.

Mr. MOTT. Oh, that is true. That is a definition of commerce, but then turn to section 8, where the bill prescribes what shall be an unfair practice, and show me in section 8 any limitation whatever. Show me why under section 8 this would not apply to the printing business in a small town in the center of a State.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. If the gentleman will turn to page 14, line 23——

Mr. CONNERY. If the gentleman will permit me to conclude, I have taken up too much time already.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Give me half a minute.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman will have time under the 5-minute rule. I want to be fair to both sides. So I say in conclusion I wish I had much longer time so that I could yield to all my colleagues who desire to question me. I shall be glad to answer any question in my power. I hope when we get to the 5-minute rule, you will vote down all amendments. I hope you will vote this bill as it is, as reported to you today by the Committee on Labor, with two amendments which I shall offer, one to protect free speech, and the other in regard to making provision for the continuance of the Board between last Sunday, when, except for an Executive order, the Board would go out of existence under Resolution 44, and the time until the bill is passed and signed by the President. Except for those two amendments, I hope the House will vote down every other amendment except the committee amendments, because this is the bill in the form that the President of the United States wants it now, and may I say that with the passage of this bill and its signature by the President labor will owe an everlasting debt of gratitude to President Franklin Delano Roosevelt for his insistence in demanding that Congress do justice to the toiling masses of America by passing now this great humanitarian piece of legislation, which, to my mind, will mean peace between capital and labor, better living conditions, better wages, and a place in the sun for America's workers. All honor to the President of the United States! [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I might preface my remarks first by stating that before I came to Congress I had been a manufacturer all of my business life, and I have employed labor and do now employ labor. During the time of my sojourn in business I never suffered a labor strike. Probably I am not the best employer of labor, and for that reason I do not believe that I am the worst. My only object in considering this bill is to try to do more for labor. I am just as much interested in seeing that labor has its just due as any man in the House. I feel no business concern can succeed today—nor could it succeed formerly, within the last 25 years or more—if labor and capital did not work hand in hand. We can say, as laborers or as manufacturers, we ought to believe in the Golden Rule, and all the laws that we might pass will never take the place of that law of Him who rules supreme above.

I cannot conform to all of the things suggested in this bill because of the fact that I believe as the bill is drawn today it will cause us to see more strikes in the next 2 or 3 years than we have ever seen in the history of this country, and Members of Congress know that in the past 2 years we have had more strikes than we have ever had in the history of the country.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I do not intend to yield to anyone until I have finished my statement, and then, if I have time, I shall yield principally to those who are labor-union men or who represent the labor unions in the House.

If an employee must be left free to join a union, so should he be left free not to join a union. There are rights of the employees and there are rights of the employers, and all of those rights must be considered if we are going to pass legislation that will eliminate strikes and make conditions in the country better for the employer and for the employee; because, as I said before, labor and capital are inseparable. They must work together. The majority of business men are honest and are striving to do the thing that is best for labor and for their business, and if the politicians make such laws that radicals and intimidators are permitted under laws, to close industry, foment strikes, then greater harm than good will be done, men will be put out of jobs instead of employed, industry will be closed rather than operated.

I am not a lawyer. I cannot, therefore, speak of the quality of this act with legal authority, but I have read and listened to authoritative argument to which the committee of this House has paid little attention. They convince me that the measure before us is in deadly conflict with the decision of the Supreme Court in the Poultry case and the long line of cases that led up to that declaration. If I am not a student of common law, I, at least, have some common sense. I understand the difference between the power of Congress to regulate intercourse between the States, which we call the commerce power, and the prohibition against any attempt by Congress to regulate production within the States. I know that the power to regulate commerce extends to the persons engaged in that commerce and the instrumentalities of that commerce, like interstate railroads, telephones, and ships. I know the difference between regulating the relations between employer and employee in carrying on interstate communication on a railroad or a telephone company, or a ship, and undertaking to regulate the employment relations of the parties who are engaged in building engines or making telephones or putting a ship together. I can see that one is a regulation of commerce and the other is a regulation of production.

I know the Supreme Court, in the Poultry case, said in very clear language that—

> Persons employed in slaughtering and selling in local trade are not employed in interstate commerce. Their hours and wages have no direct relation to interstate commerce.

I know that means that Congress cannot regulate the hours or wages or working conditions of a man engaged in plucking poultry or making shoes or manufacturing furniture, even though, after the job is finished, in each case the goods might be shipped in interstate commerce. For the same reason, it is just as clear to me that a dispute between employer and employee about plucking poultry or making the shoes, or the furniture, is a dispute not in commerce but in production, and you cannot make it a part of commerce by saying it is or declaring that it affects commerce by using a lot of words to that effect, when, as a matter of fact, as the Supreme Court has so plainly said, as of other acts, the relations of employer and employee engaged in manufacture or local service may remotely and indirectly affect it.

I know that it is equally true that for years, whenever there was a local strike that shut down a plant, in whole or part, that any attempt to bring an injunction against the strikers, because they were restraining production and therefore restraining commerce, was denied by the Federal courts, and it was the unions who raised this issue. And I know that the Supreme Court sustained their view and, in the poultry case, the Court recites these very cases and says that—

> This principle frequently has been applied in litigation growing out of labor disputes.

Of course, if all the miners in the United States quit work together in order to deprive the Nation of fuel, their purpose being to stop all its commerce, we would have a very different situation. We would have just such a one as confronted Woodrow Wilson, in 1919, when the same President of the United Mine Workers threatened the country with a general strike, just as they do today, unless we enact the Guffey bill. Then President Wilson, addressing this Congress, October 27, 1919, said:

> This strike is not only unjustified; it is unlawful.

And to protect the people of the United States he proceeded to stop it. There was a different conception of the public interest in the White House then.

I speak of this to call the attention of the House to the difference between any kind of a combination whose purpose is to tie up or obstruct the commerce of the United States and the attempt to make every petty dispute between an employer and an employee in local production the ground for a complaint to a Federal board. Surely no Member of this House who has regard for the oath which he took to support the Constitution can fail to have a doubt as to the validity of this legislation. If he does have such a doubt, then he ought to resolve it before he acts, for I distinctly repudiate such statements as are made by Mr. William Green that Congress ought to act and then let the Supreme Court determine the constitutionality of our acts. We are agents with limited powers, and the Court gives every reasonable presumption to the constitutionality of what we do, because it believes that we have settled our own doubts and not passed them up to the Court.

I read the other day the statement of our congressional obligation by one of the greatest American judges in his work on constitutional law, and I venture to call it to the attention of this House, because too many of us have forgotten its nature.

Legislators have their authority measured by the Constitution; they are chosen to do what it permits, and nothing more, and they take solemn oath to obey and support it. When they disregard its provisions, they usurp authority, abuse their trust, and violate the promise they have confirmed by an oath. To pass an act when they are in doubt whether it does not violate the Constitution is to treat as of no force the most imperative obligations any person can assume. A business agent who would deal in that manner with his principal's business would be treated as untrustworthy; a witness in court who would treat his oath thus lightly, and affirm things concerning which he was in doubt, would be held a criminal. Indeed, it is because the legislature has applied the judgment of its members to the question of its authority to pass the proposed law, and has only passed it after being satisfied of the authority, that the judiciary waive their own doubts and give it their support. (Thomas M. Cooley, Principles of Constitutional Law.)

Let me give you a test for this bill. Suppose there was a labor dispute in the Schechter Poultry Corporation, the company which appealed the case in which the Supreme Court just decided. Suppose a complaint is made to the labor board you propose to establish charging that this man Schechter committed an unfair labor practice by attempting to interfere with the self-organization of his employees or refused to bargain with their representatives. Would that be a case for this board? Here, of course, Mr. Green—or Mr. CONNERY—would say "yes." Why? Because it would be a "labor dispute", under paragraph 9 of section 2 of this bill, and under paragraph 7 of the same section, it would affect commerce, because it might be "tending to lead to a labor dispute pertaining to or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce." Would the proposed labor board take jurisdiction? Of course it would; but if it did, it would plainly be dealing with an employment relation which the Supreme Court says is local. But, although it is local in every circumstance, this bill is drawn so as to drag it by definition into commerce. Are the gentlemen of this House fooled into believing that by calling a thing "commerce" they can make it so? I do not have to be a lawyer to know better than that.

Referring to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] that this legislation has been sent down here by the administration—and when anything is sent here by the administration we are supposed to be gullible enough to accept it as it is forwarded to us without amendment—I think it is an imposition upon the Membership of Congress, and I want to read at this juncture where Mr. Green, of the American Federation of Labor, threatened a general strike. This is in New York, under date of May 23:

NEW YORK, May 23.—Labor stands ready to tie up the Nation's industry by throwing down its tools in a general strike if Congress fails to grant its basic demands, William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, warned today.

CROWD ROARS APPROVAL

The crowd roared its approval as the labor leader threatened:

"If Congress fails us, labor has its economic strength. If it comes to the point, we can mobilize our complete strength and refuse to work until we get our rights."

And when the applause had thundered away, he added grimly: "That is no idle threat! I mean just what I say."

In addition, he told the audience, labor must be ready to mobilize its political strength to defeat unfriendly Congressmen when they run for reelection.

I want to say to Mr. Green and I want to say to anybody in this land of ours, whenever I cannot use that God-given right of mine to think, I do not want to be in the House of Representatives. I would not be here, and if Mr. Green or anybody else thinks he is going to domineer me when it comes to using my best judgment in trying to legislate, then God forbid that I be a Member of Congress. This is intimidation of the worst sort, and that is what radical labor men resort to, to coercion and force to meet their own selfish ends, whether it is the best thing to do for the greatest number or not. I personally must try to make laws for all and for their best interest, not for any particular minority when it does injury to a greater number.

Now, when you examine this bill you can see that is precisely what is proposed to be done, for we propose to create a permanent labor board to entertain complaint with respect to what are called "unfair labor practices." These are five in number, and they can be committed only by an employer. The same things may be done by an employee, but they are not unlawful. Now, what are these things? They are to restrain or coerce employees in self-organization or forming, joining, or assisting labor organizations, or bargaining collectively through representatives of their own choosing. A little later we will see that this is precisely what the bill will not permit, but for the moment let us see what the labor practices are. I have said that they are interference, restraint, or coercion with the above rights by an employer, or domination or interference by him or the contribution of financial support to any labor organization. Of course, under the rules established by the Board an employer may be permitted to allow employees to confer with him during working hours without loss of pay, but it is very interesting to observe that he is not to be permitted to allow the employees to confer among themselves without loss of pay. Yet how can they prepare to confer with him if they may not confer among themselves? Of course, the purpose of that is to permit only one kind of a labor organization to function.

The remaining unfair labor practices are to discriminate in employment so as to discourage or encourage membership in any labor organization or to discriminate against an employee because he files charges under this bill or to refuse to bargain with the representatives of employees. The employer may make an agreement with a majority of his employees to make it a condition of employment that the employee shall join the majority organization. That, of course, means the establishment of the closed shop.

Now, what do these terms mean? What is interference? Is it discussing with employees the merits or demerits of any particular organization? Is it refusal to deal with a Communist organization? Because Communist organizations, under the definition of this bill by paragraph 5, section 2, have exactly the same standing as any reputable labor organization. So long as part of its purpose is to deal with an employer respecting working conditions, he is just as much obliged to deal with its representatives as any other kind of organization and thus encourage the very type of organization that is constantly denounced on the floor of this House. Moreover, it does not make any difference what the reputation of any organization that seeks to deal with the employer is. It may not keep its contracts, it may have bad leadership, but it will be an unfair practice not to recognize its representatives and deal with them. If the employer discusses these things with his employees, is he interfering with them? Is he discriminating in employment when he refuses to hire men of bad reputation, or is he dominating and interfering with the formation of a labor organization if he undertakes to discuss the number of apprentices that ought to be permitted, or any one of the numerous questions that arise in the normal relations of employer and employee by means of which they live in peace and amity?

Walter Lippmann severely criticized this measure, because he said that in a field where clear definition was most important this sloppy measure presented vague and indefinite definitions of unlawful conduct that would constantly multiply disputes and litigation. In other words, it encourages by its bad draftmanship exactly what it claims to minimize.

That is what they call a "penal statute." The courts have again and again said that if such statutes are ambiguous and do not clearly tell us in advance what we can do and what we cannot do, they are bad laws. In this field they make worse policy because they breed discord and bitterness and afford to the man who is looking for it the chance to make unfounded complaints. What this bill will do is to create a gigantic police court, for employers may be summoned from every part of the United States on any kind of a petty dispute, and if the board constituted is no more impartial than the one which we have witnessed in action or the one over which the sponsor of this bill presided, it will breed strikes as fast as a fish lays eggs.

Perhaps the worst feature of this bill which carries the intrinsic evidence of this unfairness is the declaration that only the employer shall be prohibited from intimidation, coercion, and restraint. The President of the United States, when he settled the automobile dispute, March 25, 1934, made a notable declaration. He said:

> The Government makes clear that it favors no particular union or particular form of employee organization or representation. The Government's only duty is to secure absolute and uninfluenced freedom of choice, without coercion, restraint, or intimidation from any source.

The President was not talking about his opinion. He was talking about what was the Government's duty. Now, by giving his approval to the measure before us he has abandoned his conception of public duty and substituted for it his endorsement of tolerated coercion by one class of citizens, while condemning the same kind of coercion by another class of citizens. I know of no greater injustice than to say that it shall be unlawful for one group of our people to do that which other groups are permitted to do. It is a distinct encouragement to lawlessness. In this case it is not secret, occasional, or sporadic lawlessness.

It is notorious, customary coercion which accompanies every kind of a labor dispute of any proportions with which we are familiar. Every Member of this House knows it as well as I do. I have no use for boycotts or blacklists or intimidation by employer or by employees, corporations or by labor unions. The corporation and labor union which hires thugs or tolerates or condones violence ought to keep the lock step of fellow convicts. I know it will be said that labor unions condemn lawless acts, but I have yet to hear of any labor organization that has ever suspended or expelled any member for engaging in such conduct of which it was the beneficiary. Yet this House, in the face of the declaration made by the President of the United States as to what the duty of government is, is asked to write into this bill a prohibition of coercion against employers on the ground that they alone interfere with self-organization or the selection of representatives. Every one within the sound of my voice knows that closed-shop unionism is determined to have no representatives except those of its own selection. It has not accepted the outcome of any election that went against it under elections supervised by the Labor Board, no matter how great the majority. Mr. Green has said, in an interview with the American Magazine for May, that he never will accept the results of such an election, save temporarily and under compulsion.

I have always thought that the most elementary right of an American is that of selecting and pursuing the employment of his choice. In that right he is to be free from molestation or intimidation by anyone. This House is asked to write in the law the proposition that he shall be free only from employers and that the equally notorious coercion of labor organizations shall be ignored. How long do you think that kind of arbitrary classification will stand in a court? You also propose to give to this labor board, with only the guidance of your vague definitions, the power to determine what constitutes these unfair labor practices. You give that board a jurisdiction and an authority greater than is possessed by any of our courts. Without rules of evidence it is to make findings of facts and they are to bind the court which reviews them. It is to have the power to have its orders enforced by the courts, and how? By injunctions. The American Federation of Labor has fought in Congress for years to destroy what it called "government by injunction." Now it is asking for it and asking you to govern the employment relations of the United States by injunction. But this time it is the conduct of employers, not their own, that is to be subjected to injunction.

All that I have said about the unconstitutionality of this bill is emphasized by what the Committee on Labor has done with it. Since it passed the Senate they have rewritten their report and brought in 21 amendments for the purpose of trying to save it from the condemnation of the courts, but no trick of theirs can save it from its fundamental defect, and that is the attempt by the Federal Government to take control of and regulate the relation of employer and employee entirely within the States, and while engaged in acts of manufacture, construction, mining, and service. They still think that a dispute in a factory, a restaurant, a barber shop, or a pants-pressing establishment might lead to a dispute that might lead to a strike that might threaten our commerce. The more I have read this bill the more I am inclined to think that the gentlemen would pass a bad bill and have it overthrown in order that they may find a new reason for criticizing the Court which will be compelled to condemn this flagrant violation of constitutional authority.

But are the gentlemen gaining new rights for labor? On the contrary, I think they are inflicting new wrongs upon the worker, for, if this bill is enacted, his right of self-organization and association will not be enlarged—it will be contracted. First of all, the labor board, not himself, will determine the unit of employment which is to select representatives. Unless he is a part of the majority in that unit he will not be represented by an agent of his own selection. As an individual, whether he is in a big or little unit of employment, he cannot make his own contract and sell his own labor if a majority of his fellow employees want to sell it collectively. This is not enlarging the right of self-organization or association. This bill gives fellow employees the right to coerce and intimidate their fellows in the exercise of every one of these rights. It destroys individual bargaining, takes away the right to determine their own unit of employment, and, unless you are part of a majority, the worker will have to let someone whom he did not select sell his labor for him. I predict with confidence that, if this measure is enacted, it will have a short life but an unhappy one, for it will breed strife and bitterness, as it is neither practical nor effective to protect the rights it pretends to safeguard. On the contrary, it is defective, biased class legislation and deserves from this House the condemnation it will receive from the courts.

I cannot conclude my comments on this measure more appropriately than by quoting the characterization which it received from the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] who, pointing to the lopsided, arbitrary, and unjust provision approving coercion by one group and tolerating it when committed by another, said:

> As I see this particular section, it looks to me like an effort to force every man in America to join a certain kind of union, whether or not he wishes to join that union; and the coercion and intimidation features are not to be inserted in this section because a certain union desires a free hand to take the workers from the groups in which they now belong into groups into which they may not wish to go.
> That is the naked fact back of the opposition to this amendment. It is an amendment to force all working people into a particular union, and every Senator on this floor knows that to be the truth. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 16, 1935, p. 7672.)

The Wagner Act will work in the interest of only a small minority of workers represented by professional labor leaders, will promote industrial strife, will bring about an epidemic of labor disputes, will drive employers and employees apart, and will substantially impede recovery.

It will in practice tend to make a closed shop of every plant and to make every employee carry a union card if he is to earn a living.

It penalizes employers for so-called "unfair practices" but will leave the agents and organizers of labor unions or the labor unions themselves completely free to use violence, intimidation, and other coercive methods which they may seek to employ.

Every employer is compelled to report in detail every dollar of money received and how every dollar is expended, so why not compel labor unions to give a strict accounting of the money that they receive, and above all, how same is spent? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has expired.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the legislation before us is, in my opinion, one of the most progressive and humanitarian measures that was ever brought before any Congress. If this bill is enacted into law, the laboring man of the United States will, for the first time, get a square deal. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW].

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, the measure we are considering today is, in my opinion, one of the most misunderstood and misrepresented pieces of legislation that has been considered by this House. I have received numerous letters of protest stating that if this measure were passed it would wreck industry. Most of the individuals writing these letters do not understand the measure. They do not realize that this board of three appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate has no jurisdiction over the determination of the hours of labor; have nothing to do with wage disputes; that their only duty is to determine who shall represent employees so that collective bargaining may be an actuality.

This measure, first, writes into the law the right of workers to bargain collectively with employers through representatives of their own choosing.

Second, it creates a board of three, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, to serve as a "supreme court of labor" over industrial disputes.

Third, it outlaws company-dominated union.

Fourth, it specifies that employers must bargain with representatives of the majority of their workers.

Fifth, in cases where there is doubt about the representatives of the majority, the board is authorized to order and supervise plant elections to make this determination.

The deluge of protests I have received reminds me of what happened in the State of Wisconsin prior to the enactment of the unemployment-insurance act. The industrialists of Wisconsin at that time said that the passage of the unemployment-insurance act would wreck industry. Notwithstanding these protests, the measure was enacted into law and has been in force for almost 1 year. Now that industry in Wisconsin realizes the benefits that will be derived from unemployment insurance, they are heartily in favor of it. As a matter of fact, I have a number of letters from industrialists who now are convinced that in the future it will be a lifesaver, although they protested vehemently prior to its passage.

I predict at this time that if this measure is enacted into law—and it will be—that within a short period after it is working the majority of these same individuals who are now protesting against its passage will favor its retention.

As has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], strikes have been prevalent in this country during the past 2 years.

The passage of this legislation is the only cure for the labor difficulties which have been characteristic for the past few years.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHROW. I yield.

Mr. RICH. If we find there are less strikes in the next 2 years, I will be the first one to congratulate the gentleman on his recommendation. If, on the other hand, we find we are going to have more strikes, then I should like to have the gentleman call it to my attention.

Mr. WITHROW. Very well. That is fair enough.

Eight hundred and twelve thousand one hundred and thirty-seven workers were involved in strikes during 1933. In 1934 the number rose to 1,277,344. Within a span of 24 months over 32,000,000 man-days were lost because of labor controversies.

Nine-tenths of these disputes arose because the workers were demanding the right to organize and bargain collectively with their employers. There was no question of higher wages or shorter hours involved.

Our workers will never be content and satisfied until they have a representation and an organization which is really and truly of their own choosing. On the whole, they will never submit to a company-dominated organization.

The company-dominated union is frequently supported in part or in whole by the employer. I cannot conceive how anyone can rise to the defense of a practice so contrary to American principles as one which permits the advocates of one party to be paid by the other. Collective bargaining becomes a sham when the employer sits on both sides of the conference table or pulls the strings behind the spokesman of those with whom he is dealing.

The right of self-government through fairly chosen representatives is a right which is inherent to the American people and to our American form of government. This bill does no more than guarantee that right to American labor.

No sincere objection can be made to this bill except by those who seek to exploit the American working man and woman. [Applause.]

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time in order that I might in a few minutes discuss the question of the constitutionality of this act.

My position is a little different from some of the other Members. I came into this Congress late. I came down here and stood by myself in the well of this House and about all that I remember was that the Speaker asked me whether or not I would swear to support the Constitution of the United States. The President of the United States took that same oath of office.

In considering this bill I think this is true, and it cannot be denied, that as Congressmen we should first determine in our own minds whether or not it is constitutional. If we determine that it is constitutional, then we should determine whether or not on its merits we are for or against it. But, if we determine honestly and conscientiously in our own minds that it is unconstitutional, I do not see how any of us can vote for it. It may be said that that is a question for the courts. I say to you that the first line of defense against attack on the Constitution is the Congress of the United States. We have no moral and no legal right to enact any law in contravention of the Constitution. I say that is a duty that is incumbent upon every one of us. In considering this measure and every other measure, we ought to have that thing in mind.

I think some of those who contend against the Constitution have forgotten that those people who drafted the Constitution did not create a lot of new truths or new facts. They did not discover anything. They simply set forth in black and white a lot of self-evident truths. They set forth in black and white for the protection of our liberties and our form of government those things that the experiences of all civilization had proved were essential in the make-up and government of any free people.

Now, in considering this bill the Chairman of the Committee on Rules said that it seeks to do what was declared could not be done in section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act. I say that if this is an attempt to do that, it is clearly unconstitutional; and if the ingenuity of the Government attorneys could not sustain section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, then, in like measure, they cannot sustain this provision and this bill.

You are all familiar with the Schechter decision, which said that the Federal Government can only regulate interstate commerce or those things having a direct effect and bearing upon interstate commerce. Now, let us consider this bill. What might be called the "preamble", the thing that is the argument for the constitutionality of the bill, starts out by saying that the denial to employees of the right to organize and bargain collectively leads to strikes. Then what do the strikes do? Strikes lead to burdens on interstate commerce. Now, let us consider the indirect and the direct causation, if you please, in the light of the Schechter case. The indirect cause is the failure to recognize the right of collective bargaining. That induces strikes. Strikes are the direct effect and burden on interstate commerce. Who can contend for a minute that the matter of collective bargaining in a purely intrastate business, in the case of a company, for instance, about which I inquired of the Chairman of the Labor Committee, has a direct effect upon interstate commerce? I want to make this clear: I stand for the principle of collective bargaining. Labor has a right to bargain collectively in order that their bargaining power may equal that of the employer. They have a right to bargain by representatives of their own choosing; but that is not the first issue. The first issue is, Is this bill constitutional? I do not believe that it is.

There is no effort to limit the application of this bill or the power of the board that is to be set up to the control of interstate transactions or transactions directly affecting interstate commerce. This is exactly the thing criticized in the Schechter case. The Supreme Court there said it was not attempted to limit the application of N. R. A. to interstate trade and commerce alone. The board set up under this bill will look to the provisions of this bill believing that the Congress in its alleged wisdom has enacted a bill in harmony with the Constitution, but the minute they begin to enforce the act with respect to a purely intrastate business, the same decision will be handed down that was handed down in the Schechter case.

You may ask, what is the difference? The difference is that in the 2 years it takes to get a ruling on the constitutionality of a measure the rights of people under the Constitution as they conceive them, have been taken from them under an act of Congress. That is why I say it is imperative first of all for Congress to determine whether or not an act is constitutional. We cannot justify the passage of an unconstitutional act by saying that it is a question for the courts, because in the meantime people may be imprisoned or have their property taken from them.

The Coronado case and other cases were cited. The Coronado Coal case involved the mining of coal in one State for delivery in another in interstate commerce. The Danbury Hatters case involved the manufacture of hats in Connecticut and their sale in San Francisco, in interstate commerce. The Bedford Stonecutting case arose out of stone produced in my State and sold in the East in interstate commerce. The Printing Press case involved printing presses made in Battle Creek, Mich., and sold in interstate commerce in New York. Certain people combined and conspired to restrict the free flow of interstate commerce in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, to restrict and prevent those manufacturers from transporting their property and selling it in other States. I would not contend for a minute that that was not interstate commerce; clearly it is. If this bill by its terms undertook to limit this board and its jurisdiction to matters of that sort, I would say then that it was within the realm of interstate commerce and subject to control by the Federal Government.

If you do not believe in the Constitution, if you do not believe in States' rights or the exercise by the States of the sovereign power of the States to control intrastate commerce in their own way, the residuum of power in these United States as a free country is vested in the people and the people can change the Constitution. I say that it is not only our privilege but our duty to respect and uphold the Constitution of the United States so long as it is written as it is. Here and now let me say that I am as friendly to labor as any person who sits in this House, but I believe the laboring man has as big a stake in the Constitution, has as big a stake in the future of this country under that Constitution, as any person whoever he may be or however much he may have.

In this House we frequently hear the statement made by men who claim to be lawyers—and I do not claim to be a constitutional lawyer—"I have not looked into the constitutionality of the bill, I do not know whether it is constitutional or not."

I got to thinking about this, and I spent over half the night reading the decisions the proponents of the bill rely upon to support their contention of constitutionality. It is my honest, conscientious, and sincere opinion that power is vested in this purported authority set up under this act to exercise control of commerce, which power is not limited to interstate commerce or those things directly affecting interstate commerce. For this reason I claim the act is unconstitutional. Without regard to what we may think of the merits of the bill, or whether it produces a good situation or a bad situation, I do not see how any of us can support the bill as it is now drafted, in the light of the Constitution and the Supreme Court decisions thereunder, and under our oaths to support and uphold the Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, as a Representative from an agricultural district, I think that when we shall have passed this bill we will have brought about an equality that has been a long time coming. Under the A. A. A. and the amendments thereto passed yesterday, the farmer has an equality in the tariff that he has never had before. Under this bill we shall give labor an equal position with the employer, a position labor has never had before. We have manufacturers' organizations, chambers of commerce, and many different types of organizations that give employers a chance to have agreements, and it is high time that we had a permanent piece of legislation giving to labor the power to bargain collectively and in the open. We hear much talk about the power it will put into the hands of the American Federation of Labor and the power it will put into the hands of agitators. It is my opinion that to give labor clearly and legally the right to organize and do it openly will bring about a situation where the suspicion and hatred that existed when union activities had to be carried on by subterfuge will no longer exist. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill because it is obviously unconstitutional; because it forbids the courts of the land to consider the controversies arising under it under the usual rules of evidence and procedure pertaining to other litigations; because it abrogates the right to contract; and because I believe it holds out false hopes that cannot be realized under the present Constitution, and which will lead to strife rather than peace.

It seems hardly necessary to remind anyone that we have recently and forcefully had called to our attention the limitations upon the power of the Congress under the interstate commerce clause.

We have no earthly power under the Constitution to legislate with respect to labor disputes except those labor disputes which directly affect interstate commerce as so often defined by the Supreme Court.

We have every reason to believe and to know that if we pass a law dealing with labor disputes or any other matter that stands outside of the power of Congress under the interstate commerce clause it will be promptly nullified by the Supreme Court.

The particular clause to which I wish to draw attention is subsection 7 of section 2, on page 7 of the bill.

This section, as reported from the Labor Committee before the Schechter decision, read as follows:

(7) The term "affecting commerce" means in commerce, or burdening or affecting commerce or obstructing the free flow of commerce, of having lead or tending to lead to a labor dispute that might burden or affect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce.

The bill was recommitted to the committee in order that it might be made to conform to that decision. The committee labored and brought forth the following provision as it now appears in the bill:

(7) The term "affecting commerce" means in commerce or burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce, and having lead or tending to lead to a labor dispute, burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce.

The mere transposition of some of the words in the original bill has brought about nothing more than the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum. The thinly veiled effort to impose upon the Supreme Court a definition of interstate commerce to meet the exigencies of this occasion will not avail.

Nothing new was said in the Schechter case. The Court by a series of decisions running over a period of 150 years has clearly and definitely defined the limitations upon Congress under the interstate-commerce clause. There is a clear line of demarcation running through all of these decisions, and in order to pass a valid law we must remain within the channels so defined, however irksome it may be.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and append thereto quotations of the Supreme Court on this subject in a number of decisions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, to my mind it is entirely clear how far we may go and where we must stop. If we do not stop when we reach the stopping place, the act will be declared unconstitutional by the Court and the earnest and untiring efforts of the advocators of this bill will be wasted through their overzealousness.

We cannot change the Constitution by undertaking to define interstate commerce. We are merely fooling ourselves and holding out false hopes to others. Whatever the need may be, however great the urgency may be to find some method to regulate labor disputes by the Congress, it cannot be done except in controversies directly affecting interstate commerce. All Members of the House know that only an infinitesimal percentage of potential labor disputes can be legitimately reached under the interstate-commerce clause.

Why seek to camouflage the situation with unconstitutional legislation when we all know that the only solution of the problem would be a constitutional amendment? There is ample provision for this method and while many of us will differ as to the propriety of an amendment for this purpose, nevertheless, it is a fair issue that can be fought out in the method prescribed by the Constitution. To each State in the Union would be given the opportunity to say whether she desired to adhere to the rights reserved to her under the Constitution, or whether she is willing to surrender more of these rights to the National Government.

Too many of the reserve powers of the States have been taken away by judicial interpretation and other means. I appeal to you not to further strip the States of their police powers in purely local matters by means of legislation of this character forced through under whip and spur of real or fancied emergency.

And to those gentlemen who complain of the limitations imposed upon the Congress by the Supreme Court decisions, may I remind them that those decisions have consistently from the beginning of our Government broadened and enlarged the powers of Congress beyond any measure conceived by the framers of the Constitution. May I remind you that President Madison, who was known as "the father of the Constitution", vetoed the first public-works program for the improvement of rivers and harbors on the grounds that the Constitution did not permit it. And may I remind you that Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Gibbons against Ogden, revolutionized the whole conception of the interstate-commerce clause by construing it to include not only commerce itself, but the means of transportation by which commerce was carried on. From that time on the Court has continually liberalized the definition of "interstate commerce" to include everything that could honestly be construed as affecting it.

Throughout those interpretations, however, has run a clear line of consistency, namely, that the legislation must deal with subject directly affecting commerce between the States.

First. It includes transportation, communication, and trafficking between citizens of different States.

Second. It includes control over activities in the nature of conspiracies that directly impede or hinder the shipment of goods in interstate commerce.

Third. And it includes control over the shipment of goods and the transportation of persons when the thing itself or the object of the shipment is injurious or against public morals.

I believe that every case that has been decided is brought within these limitations and when it has been sought to go further as is done in this bill, the Supreme Court has uniformly refused to take jurisdiction under the commerce clause.

To illustrate, the cases when the Court has taken jurisdiction under the interstate-commerce clause and when it has refused to take jurisdiction:

First. The Court has refused the use of the channels of interstate commerce in the shipment of liquor, in lottery cases, and white-slavery cases. Why? Because in each of those cases the harmful nature of the transaction itself was regarded as having a direct and deleterious effect upon interstate commerce.

Second. The Court has taken jurisdiction to prevent boycott and conspiracies formulated for the purpose of preventing the use of certain goods or the products of certain factories. Why? Because in each of these instances the direct object was to prevent the articles from being shipped in interstate commerce, thereby obstructing the free flow.

And in every case the Court has carefully preserved the distinction between manufacture and commerce, taking jurisdiction in the latter and refusing it in the former. It has repeatedly, over and over, said that interstate commerce does not include the manufacture of goods for shipment in interstate commerce, the mining of coal or other minerals for shipment in interstate commerce, or the gathering or preparation of any articles for shipment in interstate commerce, where the article has not begun its journey in interstate commerce or where the transportation has finally terminated and the goods have come to rest for local distribution.

A striking illustration is found in the child-labor cases. There the law prohibited the shipment in interstate commerce of goods manufactured in factories where child labor was employed. The law was intended to remedy a recognized evil. There was no question of its lofty motives or the desirability of correcting the evil, and yet the Supreme Court held that Congress was powerless to deal with the subject under the interstate-commerce clause. Why? Because, although the goods might ultimately be intended for interstate commerce, the articles themselves were harmless and had no direct deleterious effect upon the commerce, and, therefore the manufacture and preparing for shipment of the articles for interstate commerce merely indirectly and remotely affected that commerce.

Now, under this bill, if labor disputes are to be confined as they will be confined, to those questions where interstate commerce is directly involved, there will be practically no labor disputes on which the bill can legitimately operate. Therefore, it must be intended that the bill shall operate on labor disputes over which Congress has no power. I for one, am of the firm conviction that we should not pass bills that are obviously unconstitutional and obviously intended as instrumentalities to obviate and evade the limitations of the Constitution.

For example: We are told that if this bill does not pass promptly, there will be great coal strikes in the country. That strike will not operate directly upon interstate commerce, but upon the mining and production of coal partly in and partly out of interstate commerce.

Repeatedly the Supreme Court has said that we have no power under the interstate-commerce clause to interfere in any way with the mining of coal except to prevent or punish a conspiracy to restrain interstate commerce, although the indirect effect might keep out of the flow of commerce coal that otherwise would be shipped. As this bill does not operate as against employees, any conspiracy or combination to bring about the strike that would prevent the shipment of coal would not be reached by the terms of the bill, and certainly the employers, against whom the bill does operate, could not be reached on a charge of a conspiracy to bring about the strike by not acceding to employees' demands.

I merely cite the coal situation as an example of practically every other mining and manufacturing industry, because the same situation with respect to interstate commerce appears in practically all of them.

The result, therefore, is that the bill cannot legitimately operate in enough instances to justify the machinery that has to be set up. And, on the other hand, if it is the intention of the proponents of the bill to make it operate in all industry indirectly affecting interstate commerce, then the Supreme Court will unquestionably declare it unconstitutional at the first opportunity.

In the few minutes at my disposal I wish to call attention to those phases of the bill which obliterate the right of individuals to contract and take away from the courts the power to decide these controversies under the usual rules of evidence and procedure.

I refer first to section 10 A, page 14, line 24. In referring to the power of the board "this power shall be exclusive and shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment that has been or may be established by agreement, code, law, or otherwise."

Is it conceivable we intend to pass a law which we solemnly proclaim cannot be affected by any future law, and which we further say cannot be affected by the agreement of the contracting parties themselves?

I again call attention in the same section to the language used on page 15, line 21, "in any such procedure the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling." I hope that in the discussion of this bill that some of its advocates will inform the Members of the House just what is meant by this language.

Again, on page 18, line 2, the language of the bill once more does violence to the usual rules of evidence and procedure in the courts when it provides that "the findings of the board as to facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive." This language, which does away with the usual rules of evidence, is repeatedly found in the bill.

And again, on page 19, line 24, in dealing with the power of the Federal courts to review the decisions of the board the power of the court is effectively fettered by this language:

> And the findings of the Board as to the fact, if supported by evidence, shall in like manner be conclusive.

Let me express the hope that if the bill is to be passed that the House will by amendment, so far as is possible, eliminate the most glaring of its defects.

Ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, my congressional district lies just across the Potomac in Virginia. Ten minutes' drive from the Capitol will bring you among the former homes and environments of many of the outstanding figures who aided in the foundation of our Government and influenced to a wide extent its conception and development.

I hope that each and every one of you, if you have not already done so, will sometime make a trip through the beautiful country of northern Virginia and visit its historic shrines.

As you cross the Potomac, you will be in full view of Arlington Mansion, the home of the immortal Robert E. Lee, who sacrificed wealth and official position to struggle for what he believed to be the reserved powers of the States to secede from the Union. Only a few miles away is Mount Vernon, the home of Washington, whose whole life and energies were directed toward the creation and establishment of a stable form of government for this Republic. Only a few miles from there is situated Gunston Hall, the home of George Mason, who gave to America the Bill of Rights. In Loudoun County you will find the home of James Monroe, who laid down the Monroe Doctrine, which has been recognized as a rule of international law for over a century. In the adjoining county of Fauquier you will find Oak Hill, the home of Chief Justice Marshall, who, by his interpretation of the Constitution, gave it life and breath and vigor. Still farther on, in Orange County, you will find the home of James Madison, "the father of the Constitution", and then, in the next county of Albemarle, still in my congressional district, you will find Monticello, the home of Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence and the founder of our party.

Those men in their time differed violently, and often personally, as to the construction of the Constitution, the limitations of the powers given to the Federal Government, and the extent of the powers reserved to the States. They differed then just as we differ here today, and were they with us today, they would probably differ as violently as Members of this House differ as to what powers should be exercised by the Federal Government and what powers reserved to the States. They would differ as to whether the Constitution should be amended to meet the changed conditions of the present just as the Members of this House would do. But I believe that every one of you will agree with me, that upon any proposal to evade or circumvent the Constitution to meet exigencies or emergencies, that they would stand as one man in opposition to any effort to obviate the limitations or restrictions of that document except through the orderly process provided for that purpose.

May I say a word now about the Coronado case, a brief extract from which has been read to the Members of the House today? It reminds me somewhat of the old argument that is put up sometimes that the Bible said there is no God. You may take a few words out of the opinion and perhaps draw a conclusion from it. In the first place, there were two Coronado coal cases, one in Two Hundred and Fifty-nine United States Reports and one in Two Hundred and Sixty-eight United States Reports. The gentleman this morning quoted from the last case. The first case is where the principle is laid down and extracts from that case will be found in the extension of my remarks.

In the first decision the Supreme Court laid down the broad principle that it has never varied from one iota in the 150 years of the existence of the Court. That is to say, unless the subject directly affected interstate commerce, unless it is a direct burden upon it or there is a conspiracy to restrain it, this Congress has no power to legislate.

The second case went back again to the Supreme Court on an entirely different set of facts, which were adduced at the second trial, and the Court held in the second Coronado case under the evidence produced that the evidence was strong enough to bring it within the rule laid down by the Court in the former Coronado case.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GRISWOLD. In the second Coronado case it was held that it did not turn on the conspiracy issue.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. In the second Coronado case it was held that the facts as proven in the second case were sufficient to bring it within the rule laid down by the Court in the first Coronado case. Nothing will be found in the decision of the second Coronado case where the Court, by word or by intimation, stated it intended to vary from the principle which it had previously laid down in the other case.

Mr. GRISWOLD. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the second case, as has been contended all along by gentlemen familiar with the cases, seemingly did not turn on the conspiracy issue.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Then the constitutionality of this statute depends entirely on its application. In other words, you cannot say that as this statute stands today it is unconstitutional.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I think it may be stated of the proposed measure that it is unconstitutional.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. It depends on the application.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. When the attempt is made to define interstate commerce as is undertaken in this bill, and define it outside the provisions of the Supreme Court decisions, then an unconstitutional law is being enacted.

The quotations of Supreme Court are as follows:

UNITED MINE WORKERS v. CORONADO COAL CO. (259 U. S. 344, 408)

(P. 346, syllabus)

8. Evidence that a union of coal miners belonged to a general association which, as an incident of its object to promote wages, etc., had a general policy to unionize coal mines by strikes, etc., and thus discourage competition of open-shop against union mines in interstate commerce, held not sufficient to prove that a conspiracy of the lesser organization and its members, accompanied by a local strike, to prevent the employment of nonunion miners and the mining of coal at particular mines, was a conspiracy to restrain interstate commerce in violation of the Sherman Act, where the strike and its lawless activities were the affair of the conspirators, explained by local motives, and the normal output of the mines was not enough to have a substantial effect on prices and competition in interstate commerce from which a motive to assist the general policy might be inferred (Pp. 408, 412).

At page 408 the Court said:

What really is shown by the evidence in the case at bar, drawn from discussions and resolutions of conventions and conference, is the stimulation of union leaders to press their unionizing of nonunion mines not only as a direct means of bettering the conditions and wages of their workers, but also as a means of lessening interstate competition for union operators which in turn would lessen the pressure of those operators for reduction of the union scale or their resistance to an increase. The latter is a secondary or ancillary motive whose actuating force in a given case necessarily is dependent on the particular circumstances to which it is sought to make it applicable. If unlawful means had here been used by the national body to unionize mines whose product was important, actually or potentially, in affecting prices in interstate commerce, the evidence in question would clearly tend to show that that body was guilty of an actionable conspiracy under the Antitrust Act. This principle is involved in the decision of the case of Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell (245 U. S. 229) and is restated in American Steel Foundries v. Tri-City Central Trades Council (257 U. S. 184). But it is not a permissible interpretation of the evidence in question that it tends to show that the motive indicated thereby actuates every lawless strike of a local and sporadic character, not initiated by the national body but by one of its subordinate subdivisions. The very fact that local strikes are provided for in the union's constitution, and so may not engage the energies or funds of the national body, confirm this view. Such a local case of a lawless strike must stand on its own facts and while these conventions and discussions may reveal a general policy, the circumstances or direct evidence should supply the link between them and the local situation to make an unlawful local strike, not initiated or financed by the main organization, a step in an actionable conspiracy to restrain the freedom of interstate commerce which the Antitrust Act was intended to protect.

This case is very different from Loewe v. Lawlor (208 U. S. 274). There the gist of the charge held to be a violation of the Antitrust Act was the effort of the defendants, members of a trades union, by a boycott against a manufacturer of hats to destroy his interstate sales in hats. The direct object of attack was interstate commerce.

So, too, it differs from Eastern States Retail Lumber Dealers' Association v. United States (234 U. S. 600), where the interstate retail trade of wholesale lumbermen with consumers was restrained by a combination of retail dealers by an agreement among the latter to blacklist or boycott any wholesaler engaged in such retail trade. It was the commerce itself which was the object of the conspiracy. In United States v. Patten (226 U. S. 525), running a corner in cotton in New York City by which the defendants were conspiring to obtain control of the available supply and to enhance the price to all buyers in every market of the country was held to be a conspiracy to restrain interstate trade because cotton was the subject of interstate trade and such control would directly and materially impede and burden the due course of trade among the States and inflict upon the public the injuries which the Antitrust Act was designed to prevent. Although running the corner was not interstate commerce, the necessary effect of the control of the available supply would be to obstruct and restrain interstate commerce, and so the conspirators were charged with the intent to restrain. The difference between the Patten case and that of Ware & Leland v. Mobile County (209 U. S. 405) illustrates a distinction to be drawn in cases which do not involve interstate commerce intrinsically but which may or may not be regarded as affecting interstate commerce so directly as to be within the Federal regulatory power. In the Ware & Leland case, the question was whether a State could tax the business of a broker dealing in contracts for the future delivery of cotton where there was no obligation to ship from one State to another. The tax was sustained and dealing in cotton futures was held not to be of interstate commerce, and yet thereafter such dealings in cotton futures, as were alleged in the Patten case, where they were part of a conspiracy to bring the entire cotton trade within its influence, were held to be in restraint of interstate commerce. And so in the case at bar, coal mining is not interstate commerce and obstruction of coal mining, though it may prevent coal from going into interstate commerce, is not a restraint of that commerce unless the obstruction to mining is intended to restrain commerce in it or has necessarily such a direct, material, and substantial effect to restrain it that the intent reasonably must be inferred. (See also Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers (268 U. S. 295).)

KIDD v. PEARSON (128 U. S. 1, 20)

No distinction is more popular to the common mind, or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature, than that between manufactures and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce, and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation. The legal definition of the term, as given by this court in County of Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S. 691, 702), is as follows: "Commerce with foreign countries, and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation, and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities." If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate, not only manufactures but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate, more or less clearly, an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest and the cotton planter of the South plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are and must be local in all the details of their successful management.

It is not necessary to enlarge on, but only to suggest the impracticability of such a scheme, when we regard the multitudinous affairs involved and the almost infinite variety of their minute details.

It was said by Chief Justice Marshall that it is a matter of public history that the object of vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States was to insure uniformity of regulation against conflicting and discriminating State legislation. (See also County of Mobile v. Kimball, supra, at page 697.)

This being true, how can it further that object so to interpret the constitutional provision as to place upon Congress the obligation to exercise the supervisory powers just indicted? The demands of such a supervision would require not uniform legislation generally applicable throughout the United States but a swarm of statutes only locally applicable and utterly inconsistent. Any movement toward the establishment of rules of production in this vast country, with its many different climates and opportunities, could only be at the sacrifice of the peculiar advantages of a large part of the localities in it, if not of every one of them. On the other hand, any movement toward the local, detailed, and incongruous legislation required by such interpretation would be about the widest possible departure from the declared object of the clause in question. Nor this alone. Even in the exercise of the power contended for Congress would be confined to the regulation, not of certain branches of industry, however numerous, but to those instances in each and every branch were the producer contemplated an interstate market. These instances would be almost infinite, as we have seen; but still there would always remain the possibility, and often it would be the case that the producer contemplated a domestic market. In that case the supervisory power must be executed by the State; and the interminable trouble would be presented, that whether the one power or the other should exercise the authority in question would be determined, not by any general or intelligible rule, but by the secret and changeable intention of the producer in each and every act of production. A situation more paralyzing to the State governments and more provocative of conflicts between the general Government and the States and less likely to have been what the framers of the Constitution intended, it would be difficult to imagine.

HAMMER V. DAGENHART, 247 U. S. 251, 269, 274 (OPINION BY JUSTICE DAY)

(P. 251)

The act of September 1, 1916 (c. 432, 39 Stat. 675), prohibits transportation in interstate commerce of goods made at a factory in which, within 30 days prior to their removal therefrom, children under the age of 14 years have been employed or permitted to work, or children between the ages of 14 and 16 years have been employed or permitted to work more than 8 hours in any day, or more than 6 days in any week, or after the hour of 7 p. m. or before the hour of 6 a. m. Held, unconstitutional as exceeding the commerce power of Congress and invading the powers reserved to the States.

The power to regulate interstate commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which the commerce is to be governed; in other words, to control the means by which it is carried on.

The court has never sustained a right to exclude save in cases where the character of the particular things excluded was such as to bring them peculiarly within the governmental authority of the State or Nation and render their exclusion, in effect, but a regulation of interstate transportation, necessary to prevent the accomplishment through that means of the evils inherent in them.

The manufacture of goods is not commerce, nor do the facts that they are intended for, and are afterwards shipped in, interstate commerce make their production a part of that commerce subject to the control of Congress.

The power to regulate interstate commerce was not intended as a means of enabling Congress to equalize the economic conditions in the States for the prevention of unfair competition among them by forbidding the interstate transportation of goods made under conditions which Congress deems productive of unfairness.

It was not intended as an authority to Congress to control the States in the exercise of their police power over local trade and manufacture, always existing and expressly reserved to them by the tenth amendment.

At page 269 the Court said:

The controlling question for decision is, Is it within the authority of the Congress, in regulating commerce among the States, to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of manufactured goods, the product of a factory in which, within 30 days prior to their removal therefrom, children under the age of 14 have been employed or permitted to work, or children between the ages of 14 or 16 years have been employed or permitted to work more than 8 hours in any day or more than 6 days in any week, or after the hour of 7 p. m. or before the hour of 6 a. m.?

In Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat. 1), Justice Marshall, speaking for this Court and defining the extent and nature of the commerce power, said: "It is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed." In other words, the power is one to control the means by which commerce is carried on, which is directly the contrary of the assumed right to forbid commerce from moving and thus destroy it as to particular commodities.

* * * * * * *

"The power conferred is to regulate, and the very terms of the grant would seem to repel the contention that only prohibition of movement in interstate commerce was embraced. And the cogency of this is manifest, since if the doctrine were applied to those manifold and important subjects of interstate commerce as to which Congress from the beginning has regulated, not prohibited, the existence of government under the Constitution would be no longer possible."

In each of these instances the use of interstate transportation was necessary to the accomplishment of harmful results. In other words, although the power over interstate transportation was to regulate, that could only be accomplished by prohibiting the use of the facilities of interstate commerce to effect the evil intended.

This element is wanting in the present case. The thing intended to be accomplished by this statute is the denial of the facilities of interstate commerce to those manufacturers in the States who employ children within the prohibited ages. The act in its effect does not regulate transportation among the States, but aims to standardize the ages at which children may be employed in mining and manufacturing within the States. The goods shipped are of themselves harmless. The act permits them to be freely shipped after 30 days from the time of their removal from the factory. When offered for shipment and before transportation begins, the labor of their production is over, and the mere fact that they were intended for interstate commerce transportation does not make their production subject to Federal control under the commerce power.

Commerce "consists of intercourse and traffic * * * and includes the transportation of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities." The making of goods and the mining of coal are not commerce, nor does the fact that these things are to be afterward shipped or used in interstate commerce, make their production a part thereof (Delaware, Lackawanna & Western R. R. Co. v. Yurkonis, 238 U. S. 439).

Over interstate transportation, or its incidents, the regulatory power of Congress is ample, but the production of articles, intended for interstate commerce, is a matter of local regulation.

"When the commerce begins is determined not by the character of the commodity nor by the intention of the owner to transfer it to another State for sale, nor by his preparation of it for transportation but by its actual delivery to a common carrier for transportation, or the actual commencement of its transfer to another State" (Mr. Justice Jackson, in re Green, 52 Fed. Rept. 113). This principle has been recognized often in this court (Coe v. Errol, 115 U. S. 517; Bacon v. Illinois, 227 U. S. 504, and cases cited). If it were otherwise, all manufacture intended for interstate shipment would be brought under Federal control to the practical exclusion of the authority of the States, a result certainly not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution when they vested in Congress the authority to regulate commerce among the States (Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 21).

It is further contended that the authority of Congress may be exerted to control interstate commerce in the shipment of child-made goods because of the effect of the circulation of such goods in other States where the evil of this class of labor has been recognized by local legislation and the right to thus employ child labor has been more rigorously restrained than in the State of production. In other words, that the unfair competition, thus engendered, may be controlled by closing the channels of interstate commerce to manufacturers in those States where the local laws do not meet what Congress deems to be the more just standard of other States.

There is no power vested in Congress to require the State to exercise their police power so as to prevent possible unfair competition. Many causes may cooperate to give one State, by reason of local laws or conditions, an economic advantage over others. The commerce clause was not intended to give to Congress a general authority to equalize such conditions. In some of the States laws have been passed fixing minimum wages for women, in others the local law regulates the hours of labor of women in various employments. Business done in such States may be at an economic disadvantage when compared with States which have no such regulations. Surely this fact does not give Congress the power to deny transportation in interstate commerce to those who carry on business where the hours of labor and the rate of compensation for women have not been fixed by a standard in use in other States and approved by Congress.

The grant of power to Congress over the subject of interstate commerce was to enable it to regulate such commerce, and not to give it authority to control the States in their exercise of the police power over local trade and manufacture.

CRESCENT COTTON OIL CO. V. MISSISSIPPI (257 U. S. 129)

Plaintiff in error, a Tennessee corporation, engaged in the manufacture of cottonseed oil in that State, finding it impracticable to carry on the business successfully when purchasing its supply of cottonseed from ginners or from brokers, acquired and operated cotton gins in Mississippi and other States, where it ginned cotton from cotton growers, purchased from them the seed thus separated from the fiber, and then shipped it on to its Tennessee factory. Mississippi passed a law forbidding corporations interested in the manufacture of cottonseed oil from owning or operating cotton gins, except of a prescribed capacity and in the city or town where their oil plants were located.

Held: (1) That since the ginning was merely manufacture, and the seeds were not in interstate commerce until purchased and committed to a carrier, the gins were not instrumentalities of interstate commerce and the prohibition of their operation did not infringe the company's rights under the commerce clause (p. 135).

The Court, on page 136, said:

The separation of the seed from the fiber of the cotton, which is accomplished by the use of the cotton gin, is a short but important step in the manufacture of both the seed and the fiber into useful articles of commerce, but that manufacture is not commerce was held in Kidd v. Pearson (128 U. S. 1, 20, 21); United States v. E. C. Knight Co. (156 U. S. 1, 12, 13); Capital City Dairy Co. v. Ohio (183 U. S. 238, 245); McCluskey v. Marysville & Northern Ry. Co. (243 U. S. 36, 38); Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S. 251, 252); and in Arkadelphia Milling Co. v. St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. (249 U. S. 134, 151, 152). And the fact of itself that an article when in the process of manufacture is intended for export to another State does not render it an article of interstate commerce (Coe v. Errol (116 U. S. 517) and New York Central R. R. Co. v. Mohoey (252 U. S. 152, 155)). When the ginning is completed the operator of the gin is free to purchase the seed or not, and if it is purchased to store it in Mississippi indefinitely or to sell or use it in that State or to ship it out of the State for use in another; and, under the cases cited, it is only in this last case and after the seed has been committed to a carrier for interstate transport that it passes from the regulatory power of the State into interstate commerce and under the national power.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION V. LANDON (249 U. S. 236)

While the piping of natural gas from State to State, and its sale and delivery to independent local gas companies, is interstate commerce, the retailing of the gas by the local companies to their consumers is intrastate commerce and is not a continuation of such interstate commerce, even though their mains are connected permanently with those of their vendor and their vendors agreed compensation is a definite proportion of their gross receipts. Id.

The Court, on page 244, said:

The court below held the business carried on by the receivers—transportation of natural gas and its disposition and sale to consumers through the distributing companies—was interstate commerce of a national character; that the commissions' actions interfered with establishment and maintenance of reasonable sale rates and thereby burdened interstate commerce and took the receivers' property without due process of law; that the original supply contracts were not binding upon the receivers. And it accordingly enjoined the commissions, their members, the attorneys general of both States, the various municipalities and the distributing companies from interfering with establishment of such reasonable and compensatory rates as the court might approve. We think the trial court properly overruled the objections offered to its jurisdiction and nothing need be added to the reasons which it gave (234 Fed. Rep. 152, 155). But we cannot agree with its conclusions that local companies in distributing and selling gas to their customers acted as mere agents, immediate representatives or instrumentalities of the receivers and as such carried on without interruption interstate commerce set in motion by them.

That the transportation of gas through pipe lines from one State to another is interstate commerce may not be doubted. Also, it is clear that as part of such commerce the receivers might sell and deliver gas so transported to local distributing companies free from unreasonable interference by the State (American Express Co. v. Iowa (196 U. S. 133, 143), Oklahoma v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. (221 U. S. 229), Haskell v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. (224 U. S. 217)).

But in no proper sense can it be said, under the facts here disclosed, that sale and delivery of gas to their customers at burner tips by the local companies operating under special franchises constituted any part of interstate commerce. The companies received supplies which had moved in such commerce and then disposed thereof at retail in due course of their own local business. Payment to the receivers of sums amounting to two-thirds of the product of these sales did not make them integral parts of their interstate business. In fact, they lacked authority to engage by agent or otherwise the retail transactions carried on by the local companies. Interstate commerce is a practical conception and what falls within it must be determined upon consideration of established facts and known commercial methods (Rearick v. Pennsylvania, 203 U. S. 507, 512; The Pipe Line cases, 234 U. S. 548, 560). The thing which the receivers actually did was to deliver supplies to local companies. Exercising franchise rights, the latter distributed and sold the commodity so obtained upon their own account and paid the receivers what amounted to two-thirds of their receipts from customers. Interstate movement ended when the gas passed into local mains. The court below erroneously adopted the contrary view and upon it rested the conclusion that the public commissions were interfering with establishment of compensatory rates by the receivers in violation of their rights under the fourteenth amendment.

INDUSTRIAL ASSOCIATION v. UNITED STATES (264 U. S. 64, 78, 83)

(P. 64)

For the purpose of freeing the local building industry from domination by trade unions, numerous building contractors and dealers in building material in San Francisco combined to establish, in effect, the "open-shop" plan of employment by requiring builders who desired building materials of certain specified kinds to obtain permits therefor from a builders' exchange, and by refusing such permits to those who did not support the plan. Held that the combination did not violate the Sherman Antitrust Act, because (1) its object was confined to a purely local matter and interference with interstate commerce was neither intended nor desired.

(P. 77)

(2) The materials for which permits were required were all produced in California, except one kind as to which permits were required only after they had entered the State and had become commingled with the common mass of local property, so that their interstate movement and commercial status had ended.

At page 78, the Court said:

It is true, however, that plaster, in large measure produced in other States and shipped into California, was on the list; but the evidence is that the permit requirement was confined to such plaster as previously had been brought into the State and commingled with the common mass of local property, and in respect of which, therefore, the interstate movement and the interstate commercial status had ended. This situation is utterly unlike that presented in the Swift case, supra, where the only interruption of the interstate transit of livestock being that necessary to find a purchaser at the stockyards, and this the usual and constantly recurring course, it has held (pp. 398–399) that there was thus constituted "a current of commerce among the States", of which the purchase was but a part and incident. The same is true of Stafford v. Wallace (258 U. S. 495, 516), which likewise dealt with the interstate shipment and sale of livestock. The stockyards to which such livestock was consigned and delivered are there described, not as a place of rest or final destination, but as "a throat through which the current flows", and the sale as only an incident which does not stop the flow but merely changes the private interest in the subject of the current without interfering with its continuity. In Binderup v. Pathe Exchange (263 U. S. 291, 309), a commodity produced in one State was consigned to a local agency of the producer in another, not as a consummation of the transit, but for delivery to the customer. This Court held that the intermediate delivery did not end, and was not intended to end, the movement of the commodity, but merely halted it "as a convenient step in the process of getting it to its final destination."

But here the delivery of the plaster to the local representative or dealer was the closing incident of the interstate movement and ended the authority of the Federal Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution. What next was done with it was the result of new and independent arrangements.

The Government relies with much confidence upon Loewe v. Lawlor (208 U. S. 274) and Duplex Co. v. Deering (254 U. S. 443); but the facts there and the facts here were entirely different. Both cases, like the Coronado and the United Leather Workers cases and the present case, arose out of labor disputes; but in the former cases, unlike the latter ones, the object of the labor organizations was sought to be attained by a country-wide boycott of the employer's goods for the direct purpose of preventing their sale and transportation in interstate commerce in order to force a compliance with their demands. The four cases and the one here, considered together, clearly illustrate the vital difference, under the Sherman Act, between a direct, substantial. and intentional interference with interstate commerce and an interference which is incidental, indirect, remote, and outside the purposes of those causing it.

HUGHES BROTHERS v. MINNESOTA (272 U. S. 469–470)

1. A State cannot tax personal property which is in actual transit in interstate commerce (p. 471).

2. Pursuant to a contract of sale, logs cut in Minnesota by the vendors were floated by river to Lake Superior, there loaded on the vendee's vessels and transported to their destination in Michigan. Part of the price was paid when provisional inspection and estimates of quantity, etc., were made by the vendee at river landings, another part when the logs reached booms at or near the place of their transference to the vessels, and the remainder at destination. The wood was scaled by representatives of both parties when stowed in the vessels and at destinatiоn Liability insurance was carried by the vendor, and cargo insurance by the vendee. The vendor warranted title.

Held, that the logs had begun their continuous interstate journey with the beginning of their drive down the river, not with their subsequent transfer to the vessels (pp. 473, 475).

The Court, through Chief Justice Taft, on page 475, said:

The conclusion in cases like this must be determined from the various circumstances. Mere intention by the owner ultimately to send the logs out of the State does not put them in interstate commerce, nor does preparatory gathering, for that purpose, at a depot. It must appear that the movement for another State has actually begun and is going on. Solution is easy when the shipment has been delivered to a carrier for a destination in another State. It is much more difficult when the owner retains complete control of the transportation and can change his mind and divert the delivery from the intended interstate destination, as in the Champlain Co. case. The character of the shipment in such a case depends upon all the evidential circumstances looking to what the owner has done in the preparation for the journey and in carrying it out.

BINDERUP v. PATHE EXCHANGE (263 U. S. 241)

New York manufacturers and distributors of motion-picture films, in the regular course of their business, shipped films from that State to Nebraska and delivered them there to a Nebraska resident, as lessee under agreements, which by their terms were to be deemed and construed as New York contracts, and which licensed and obliged the lessee to exhibit the pictures, for specified periods, in moving-picture theaters, reserved rentals to the lessors and provided for ultimate reshipment by the lessee on advices to be given by them. Held, that the business of the lessors, and their transactions with the lessee, were interstate commerce, notwithstanding that, in accordance with the contracts, the films were delivered to him through agencies of the lessors in Nebraska to which they were first consigned and transported.

The Court, through Chief Justice Sutherland, on page 309 said:

1. The film contracts were between residents of different States and contemplated the leasing by one to the other of a commodity manufactured in one State and transported to and used in another. The business of the distributors of which the arrangement with the exhibitor here was an instance, was clearly interstate. It consisted of manufacturing the commodity in one State, finding customers for it in other States, making contracts of lease with them, and transporting the commodity leased from the State of manufacture into the State of the lessees. If the commodity were consigned directly to the lessees, the interstate character of the commerce throughout would not be disputed. Does the circumstance that in the course of the process the commodity is consigned to a local agency of the distributors, to be by that agency held until delivery to the lessee in the same State, put an end to the interstate character of the transaction and transform it into one purely intrastate? We think not. The intermediate delivery to the agency did not end and was not intended to end the movement of the commodity. It was merely halted as a convenient step in the process of getting it to its final destination. The general rule is that where transportation has acquired an interstate character "it continues at least until the load reaches the point where the parties originally intended that the movement should finally end" (Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Louisiana R. R. Comm. (236 U. S. 157, 163). And see Western Union Tel. Co. v. Foster (247 U. S. 105, 113); Western Oil Refining Co. v. Lipscomb (244 U. S. 346, 349)).

In Swift & Co. v. United States (196 U. S. 375, 398) it was held that where cattle were sent for sale from a place in one State, with the expectation that the transit would end after purchase in another State, the only interruption being that necessary to find a purchaser at the stockyards, and this was a typical, constantly recurring course, the whole transaction was one in interstate commerce and the purchase a part and incident of it. It further appeared in that case that Swift & Co. were also engaged in shipping fresh meats to their respective agents at the principal markets in other cities for sale by such agents in those markets to dealers and consumers; and these sales were held to be part of the interstate transaction upon the ground "that the same things which are sent to agents are sold by them, and * * * some, at least, of the sales are of the original packages. Moreover, the sales are by persons in one State to persons in another." In the same case in the courts below, 122 Fed. 529, 533, upon this branch of the case, it is said:

"I think the same is true of meat sent to agents, and sold from their stores. The transaction in such case, in reality, is between the purchaser and the agents' principal. The agents represent the principal at the place where the exchange takes place; but the transaction, as a commercial entity, includes the principal, and includes him as dealing from his place of business."

The most recent expression of this Court is in Stafford v. Wallace (258 U. S. 495, 516), where, after describing the process by which livestock are transported to the stockyards and thence to the purchasers, it is said:

"Such transactions cannot be separated from the movement to which they contribute and necessarily take on its character. The commission men are essential in making the sales, without which the flow of the current would be obstructed, and this whether they are made to packers or dealers. The dealers are essential to the sales to the stock farmers and feeders. The sales are not in this aspect merely local transactions. They create a local change of title, it is true, but they do not stop the flow; they merely change the private interests in the subject of the current, not interfering with but, on the contrary, being indispensable to its continuity."

The transactions here are essentially the same as those involved in the foregoing cases, substituting the word "film" for the word "livestock" or "cattle" or "meat." Whatever difference exists is of degree and not in character.

UNITED STATES v. E. C. KNIGHT CO. (156 U. S. P. 1)

The American Sugar Refining Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New Jersey, being in control of a large majority of the manufactories of refined sugar in the United States, acquired, through the purchase of stock in four Philadelphia refineries, such disposition over those manufactories throughout the United States as gave it a practical monopoly of the business. Held, that the result of the transaction was the creation of a monopoly in the manufacture of a necessary of life, which could not be suppressed under the provisions of the act of July 2, 1890 (ch. 647, 26 Stat. 209), "to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies" in the mode attempted in this suit, and that the acquisition of Philadelphia refineries by a New Jersey corporation, and the business of sugar refining in Pennsylvania, bear no direct relation to commerce between the States or with foreign nations.

The Court, through Chief Justice Fuller, on page 12 said:

The argument is that the power to control the manufacture of refined sugar is a monopoly over a necessary of life, to the enjoyment of which by a large part of the population of the United States interstate commerce is indispensable, and that, therefore, the general government in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce may repress such monopoly directly and set aside the instruments which have created it. But this argument cannot be confined to necessaries of life merely, and must include all articles of general consumption. Doubtless the power to control the manufacture of a given thing involves in a certain sense the control of its disposition, but this is a secondary and not the primary sense, and although the exercise of that power may result in bringing the operation of commerce into play, it does not control it, and affects it only incidentally and indirectly. Commerce succeeds to manufacture, and it is not a part of it. The power to regulate commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which commerce shall be governed, and is a power independent of the power to suppress monopoly. But it may operate in repression of monopoly whenever that comes within the rules by which commerce is governed or whenever the transaction is itself a monopoly of commerce.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I am going to endeavor in my time to explain this bill to the best of my limited ability and then attempt to deal with some of the controversial features which have been raised here this afternoon.

The first section of the bill defines the policies and the findings of the bill. That in and of itself, while of great importance from the standpoint of economic theory and philosophy, is not very important from the standpoint of legislation.

The second section deals with definitions and the important definitions which have been challenged here are found in subsection 6 of section 2, which reads as follows:

(6) The term "commerce" means trade, traffic, or commerce, or any transportation or communication relating thereto, among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State or other Territory, or between any foreign country and any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory, or between points in the same State but through any other State or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any foreign country.

I respectfully submit that this language does not in any manner conflict with the definition of "interstate" as defined in the decision in the Schechter case. There is not a single word in this language which conflicts with the definition of "interstate" as we find it in the Constitution or in any of the statutes.

Subsection 7 reads as follows:

(7) The term "affecting commerce" means in commerce, or burdening or affecting commerce, or obstructing the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute that might burden or affect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce.

If this particular definition is to be interpreted by a board to be created under this bill so as to violate the interstate definition as handed down in the decision in the Schechter case, the Supreme Court will declare it unconstitutional; but what we are seeking to do is to have each and every case as it is presented stand on its own merits. That has been the practice with every labor case that we have had thus far. Every case as it comes up will stand on its own merits. The question will be asked: "Does the application of the law in this case violate the interstate-commerce definition as handed down in the Schechter case?" I doubt whether any constitutional lawyer can say that the term "affecting commerce" as defined in subsection 7 of section 2 is in and of itself unconstitutional. What we are trying to do here is to attempt to guarantee certain rights to labor under language which is constitutional, and if tomorrow the application of this statute in certain cases may be unconstitutional, at the same time we would preserve those rights in cases where the application of the statute would be deemed to be constitutional; but to say that such terminology as the term "affecting commerce" or as the term "commerce" as used in this bill is in and of itself in direct conflict with the definition of interstate commerce handed down in the Schechter case I think is very far-fetched, and, as a matter of fact, I believe the motive behind such argument is to defeat the great principles in the bill rather than to argue the strict constitutionality, purposes, and scope of this bill.

Section 3 creates a National Labor Relations Board, which is to be composed of three members, who shall be appointed by the President. Their salaries shall be $10,000 a year and any member of the board may be removed by the President upon notice and hearing for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office, but for no other cause.

Then, also, a committee amendment changes the Senate bill and attempts to place this board under the Department of Labor. I have filed a minority report on this subject insisting that the board be independent, and I shall discuss that question at the proper time when the committee amendment is offered.

The important sections of this bill are sections 7, 8, 9, and 10.

Section 7 does what? Up to the present time there is not a Member in this House who can deny that labor has a perfect right by going on the economic battle front, by going out on strike, to guarantee for itself the right of collective bargaining. This right which labor has, no one has dared to take away from it during the past 10 years and no one challenges it. Now, since labor has this right and labor can obtain this right only on the economic battle front by strife and by strike, by labor disputes and labor struggles which disrupt the economic stability of an industry or of a community, what can the objection be to having this right which labor can acquire on the economic battlefield placed in the law, and thus legislate for labor a bill of rights so that labor can exercise these rights by going into a court of equity through the medium of a labor board and having these rights preserved, respected, and vindicated?

What is the objection to section 7 that is being raised here? Section 7 states:

Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

Everyone who has argued against this bill this morning has stated, "I believe in the right of collective bargaining." If he believes in the right of collective bargaining, why does he challenge section 7, which asserts that labor has the right of collective bargaining?

The next section is section 8 and the purpose of section 8 is to enforce and to clarify the right of collective bargaining and to prevent any practices which would nullify that right which we are all willing to give labor under section 7, and what are these things? The provision states:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—
(1) To interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7.

If you have no quarrel with section 7, certainly you cannot have any quarrel with subdivision (1) of section 8.

Then under subdivision (2) the employer is prevented from doing what? He is prevented from dominating or interfering with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contributing financial or other support to it.

Provided, That subject to rules and regulations made and published by the Board pursuant to section 6 (a), an employer shall not be prohibited from permitting employees to confer with him during working hours without loss of time or pay.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. I should like to have the gentleman tell the Committee whether his understanding of paragraph (2) of section 8 is that the employer would not be allowed to consult with his employees directly without this exception.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Oh, no; this exception guarantees the employer the right to consult with his employees.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. May I say to my friend from New York that the purpose of that provision is that under the provisions of the bill without such an amendment an employer would be guilty of an unfair labor practice on the ground he was financing his employees if he paid them on company time and then allowed them to come in on company time and discuss matters relative to wages or anything else. So this is to take care of his interests and protect him from an unfair labor practice.

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. BEAM. A great many of these so-called "industries" have what they call their company unions or company associations or employees' associations and I would be very much interested in having the gentleman state just how these so-called "company unions" will be affected by this proposed legislation, if it is enacted.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. There is nothing in this bill which will affect the existence of a company union. All this bill provides is that it shall be an unfair labor practice to have such company union dominated by the employer, and if we believe in collective bargaining, as we all say we do, then I submit that we have a proper right to prevent an employer from taking a union over or forming one and dominating such union so that when they sit on opposite sides of the table, there is no collective bargaining, but there is only one-sided bargaining—the employer bargaining with himself. This is what we are trying to prevent. A company union, unless these unfair labor practices are engaged in, would have the right to exist under this bill and if in a particular unit, as defined by the labor board, the company union has the majority, they will elect their representatives who will deal with the employer, so that the company union will have just as much right as any other union would have that had a majority under such conditions. However, such union must not be an employer-dominated union.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman has stated the matter very succinctly, but the actual result of the passage of this bill will mean the elimination of company unions, not by force, but because the workers when they have the opportunity to pick their own union without coercion will not pick a company union.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Exactly; but what we are doing here is we are trying to eliminate the unfair labor practice of having the employer dominate the union and finance such union and control such union; and once we eliminate the unfair labor practices, you cannot have an employer-dominated company union. A company union incidentally is synonymous with an employer-dominated union. Once you remove employer control your company union becomes an honest union or ceases to exist.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. In the consideration of this measure would the gentleman be satisfied with the adoption of the principle of collective bargaining?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is the purpose of this measure, but at the same time may I say to the gentleman that the mere enunciation of the principle of collective bargaining is meaningless unless we eliminate the unfair labor practices which destroy the principle of collective bargaining. Merely stating that the employees shall have the right of collective bargaining and then not eliminating the unfair practices, collective bargaining becomes a mere name and a sham. This bill seeks to eliminate unfair labor practices and hence insure collective bargaining.

Mr. COX. Would the gentleman be satisfied with the elimination of unfair practices and the adoption of that principle of collective bargaining.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. No; may I say in answer to the gentleman, that besides the elimination of unfair labor practices we ought to have the principle of majority representation, and for the simple reason that there cannot be any collective bargaining unless it is based on majority representation. This bill provides for majority representation.

Mr. COX. Would the gentleman be satisfied with that included?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Certainly.

Mr. COX. The gentleman recognizes and accepts as correct the controlling decision of the Court in the Schechter case, and there is no purpose in the bill in any way to circumvent the effect of that decision?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is correct. There is no attempt here to circumvent the Supreme Court decision.

Mr. COX. Is there not an effort here through legislative definition, to push further Federal control beyond the point fixed by the Supreme Court as marking the limit of congressional power? Let me put the question in another way. Is not the main purpose of this bill to extend Federal control through the use of the commerce power of the Constitution by legislative definition and otherwise, to the point of taking out of State control that which has heretofore been regarded as a purely domestic activity?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Not necessarily; that is not the situation at all. We are trying to use whatever power Congress has under the commerce clause. The language of the bill is constitutional. Only when its application would be contrary to the definition of "interstate" in the Schechter case would it be declared unconstitutional. Each case would stand on its own state of facts.

I am sorry I have not the time to further elaborate on this point. It is a very interesting one. A great deal is being said today about liberty. The opponents of this bill talk about liberty of the employers to do this, and the liberty of the employers to do that. How about the liberty of the worker? Unless Congress protects the workers what liberty have they? Liberty to be enslaved, liberty to be crucified under the spread-out system, liberty to be worked to death under the speed-up system, the liberty to work at charity wages, the liberty to work long hours. So far as I am concerned, the present laissez faire policy which we have followed in reference to labor has produced a situation which can be described in the words of Anatole France, when he said: "The law in its majestic equality forbids the rich as well as the poor to sleep under bridges, beg on the streets, and steal their bread from the shop windows."

This bill should pass. It will not settle the capital-and-labor problem, but it is a great step toward a Magna Carta for American labor. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein certain excerpts from the bill and other data to which I wish to refer.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] has made my speech. He has made the kind of a speech that I imagine one of the greatest constitutional lawyers who ever served here from Virginia during our time would have made if he were here at this time. I refer to our former distinguished colleague, Hon. Henry St. George Tucker, who at one time was chairman of the American Bar Association. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] made the same kind of a speech that Mr. Tucker would have made upon this subject.

I am one of the close personal friends of the distinguished gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], the able chairman of this committee, who is the author of this bill. He is honest, sincere, energetic, efficient, and thoroughly conscientious. During our long years of association here I have learned to have for him great respect, high regard, and deep affection. There is nothing that I have that he could not get personally. If he needed it and I could help him by doing so, I would wade through snow from here as far as I could go to help him. That is how much I think of him, but I differ with him in respect to this bill.

Mr. CONNERY. And I want to say that I have the same affection for the gentleman from Texas, and whether he differs with me or not, that is his own private affair.

Mr. BLANTON. When I was a young lawyer my best client was Mr. Charles M. Cauble, of Albany, Shackelford County, Tex. He was a big cattleman. After trying a number of cases for him he began to employ me by the year.

Mr. EKWALL. At how much?

Mr. BLANTON. Before I stopped, it was about what I earn in Congress, counting the fees for each case plus the retainer he was paying me by the year. He had business not only all over Texas but also in Mexico, New Mexico, Colorado, Kansas, Wyoming, Montana, and the Dakotas, with cattle being fed all over the country, and leased ranches everywhere. He was constantly shipping whole train loads of cattle. At one time I represented him in about 50 different cases pending in courts.

I remember the first big contract that I ever drew for him and it is a wonder that it did not cause me to get fired. He had bought a big ranch and a large number of cattle, horses, and other livestock, and some grazing leases in different places, and he employed me to draw the contract covering his purchase. The owner, who was selling, to my surprise did not have a lawyer. I was so enthused in looking after the interest of my client and in seeing that every feature of that long contract involving property of great value protected my client in every particular that I drew him up what I thought was an ideal contract to protect him. I knew my client was safe but I neglected to think about the rights of the seller. Everything went along nicely until the time came for delivery, and for the contract to be executed.

Then the man from whom my client bought did not comply with the terms of the contract and it was necessary to go into court to enforce its provisions. To my surprise then the other man appeared with his lawyer and his defense was that the contract was a unilateral contract, that it was one-sided, and was so drawn that his client did not have any rights at all, and therefore was not enforceable in court. To my surprise the court set my ideal contract aside, and annulled it, and left me and my client up in the air. Then I learned what a unilateral contract was, a one-sided affair, worthless and unenforceable in the courts of the land. And I have never forgotten that valuable lesson.

Mr. Chairman, the bill we have before us here, controlling the rights of all employers and employees, is a unilateral bill, with the rights of all employers left out of it. Only the rights of employees are protected. It is one-sided.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I cannot yield, as my time is limited.

Mr. BEITER. Only to ask the gentleman whether he gave his client back his money.

Mr. BLANTON. I should have given it back, but that is the only case of his I ever lost in court, and I represented him for a number of years. Charley Cauble was the most generous and best client I ever had throughout all of the years of my law practice. That unilateral contract taught me something, and I found out then that when you want to draw a contract between individuals you must see to it that just treatment is accorded to both of the contracting parties. When you pass a law in Congress that affects the rights of two different classes of people, you must see to it that the right of both sides are considered and that they are given equal rights under the law.

Is there any provision in this bill that gives any employer of labor any rights? If there is, please point it out. I have read these 25 pages from cover to cover and I cannot find a single sentence in the bill that gives any right whatever to an employer of labor. It takes from employers all of their inherent rights.

To have employees in the country, you must have employers. Whenever you pass a law that puts employers out of business you are putting employees out of jobs, and you are acting against the best interest of the employees of the country. You must give the employers their inherent rights guaranteed by our Constitution.

The bill you have before you here this evening is a bill that will put more small businesses out of business than anything else that Congress has ever done in the last 50 years. You are going to continue and enhance the depression that has been afflicting our country for so many years. You have provisions in this bill that will be most expensive. The members of the board draw $10,000 a year each, plus traveling expenses and subsistence allowances. There is a blanket provision here that they can appoint as many employees as they want to without limitation. They can pay them the salaries they want to, except that they must conform to the Reclassification Act, and under the Reclassification Act you can pay some lawyers as high as $15,000 a year. I want to discuss now in detail some of the specific details of this bill.

EXPENSES PAID BY ALL THE PEOPLE

I quote from section 4 the following provisions:

Each member of the Board shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year. * * *

The Board shall appoint, without regard for the provisions of the civil-service laws but subject to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, an executive secretary, and such attorneys, examiners, and regional directors, and shall appoint such other employees with regard to existing laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States, as it may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of its duties. * * *

Under the above provisions a whole army of additional employees will be placed on the Government pay roll, and we will never be able to get them off. Under the Classification Act they can be paid tremendous salaries. You colleagues will remember that I gave you the names of 876 lawyers employed by the Veterans' Administration drawing salaries ranging from $9,000 per year down, and most of them were merely inexperienced lawyerettes who had never tried an important case in a courthouse prior to their appointment. And the whole people of the United States will be called upon to pay all of the enormous expenses of this board and its army of employees, when only the 3,000,000 members of the American Federation of Labor will be interested in this legislation, and it is for their especial benefit that it is passed.

NO LIMITATION WHATSOEVER ON EXPENSES

I quote the following from page 10 of the bill:

All of the expenses of the Board, including all necessary traveling and subsistence expenses outside the District of Columbia incurred by the members or employees of the Board under its orders shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the Board or by any individual it designates for that purpose.

You will note from the above that not only are traveling expenses allowed to the board, but they are also allowed to its army of employees, and that in addition to their $10,000 annual salaries these board members are allowed subsistence expenses, in addition to their traveling expenses, and likewise their army of employees are allowed their subsistence expenses in addition to their salaries and traveling expenses, when they are away from Washington, and they can be traveling and sojourning all over the United States, under the following provision which I quote from page 11 of the bill, to wit:

SEC. 5. The principal office of the Board shall be in the District of Columbia, but it may meet and exercise any or all of its powers at any other place. The Board may, by one or more of its members or by such agents or agencies as it may designate, prosecute any inquiry necessary to its functions in any part of the United States.

There are 48 States in this Union. It is a long way from Seattle to Florida. It is a long way from Maine to California. The expenses of the agents and agencies of said board meeting at any place in the United States, and exercising its powers and prosecuting its inquiries "in any part of the United States" with traveling expenses and per diem subsistence allowances in addition to salaries, are going to cost the people a tremendous sum of money annually. We have not forgotten the scores of useless and pleasure trips that were taken by scores of employees of Director John B. Densmore in the United States Employment Service during the war.

PENALTIES INTIMIDATING ALL EMPLOYEES

I quote from the bill the following penalty prescribed for any employer who impedes or interferes with any agent of this board, to wit:

Any person who shall willfully resist, prevent, impede, or interfere with any member of the Board or any of its agents or agencies in the performance of duties pursuant to this act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

Under the above provision, and the other provisions of the bill, where an employer had 50 well-satisfied employees, and they were receiving good wages, but were not unionized, and did not want to unionize, and all liked their jobs and their wages and their employer, and were all thoroughly well satisfied, if some agent interfered, and demanded that they all be unionized, if their employer were by them invited to advise with them, and were to advise against such unionization, he would be guilty of a felony, and be fined $5,000 and imprisoned for 1 year.

RIGHTS FOR EMPLOYEES, BUT NONE FOR EMPLOYERS

I quote the following from section 7 of the bill:

SEC. 7. Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

You will note that under the special heading in the bill, "Rights of employees", it is provided that they may "engage in concerted activities for mutual aid", and this is not restricted to an employer's own employees, but labor agitators from anywhere may thrust themselves into a man's business and interfere with his employees and try to get them dissatisfied and demand that they unionize against their will, because the bill, in defining "employee", uses this language on page 5, to wit:

The term "employee" shall include any employee, and shall not be limited to the employees of a particular employer.

So we may expect a constant strife and turmoil and interference by union agitators among satisfied nonunion employees in every business everywhere in the United States, and no employer will dare to say one word to his own employees, because it will mean a fine of $5,000 and a year in the penitentiary.

MORE WORK FOR OUR SUPREME COURT

Is there a good lawyer in this House who for one moment believes that such a law would be upheld by the Supreme Court? Certainly it will not stand. Passing this bill is a futile thing. It is a mere gesture.

EMPLOYERS CONDEMNED UNFAIR

Under section 8 of this bill an employer is condemned to be unfair if he should "interfere with, restrain, or coerce his employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in section 7", or if he should "interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization", or if he should "discriminate in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization", or if he should "discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee who filed charges against him or gave testimony against him."

BOARD MADE JUDGE, JURY, BAILIFF, PROSECUTOR, AND EXECUTIONER

I quote the following from section 10 of the bill:

PREVENTION OF UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

SEC. 10.(a) The Board is empowered, as hereinafter provided, to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice (listed in sec. 8) affecting commerce. * * *

(b) Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, the Board, or any agent or agency designated by the Board for such purposes, shall have power to issue and cause to be served upon such person a complaint stating the charges in that respect, and containing a notice of hearing before the Board or a member thereof, or before a designated agent or agency, at a place therein fixed, not less than 5 days after the serving of said complaint.

Under the above provision, any one of our constituents engaged in business could be summoned to appear before some agent anywhere in the United States, and to answer any kind of ridiculous charges, and would be forced to the great expense of employing high-salaried attorneys, and paying the expenses of his attorney, his witness, and his own far distant from his home for a period that could extend into weeks. This bill is going to cause more men to go out of business and more long-established businesses to close up, and more employees to lose good-paying jobs in which they are now well satisfied, than anything that has been done by Congress before in half a century.

WHOLLY WITHOUT BENEFIT OF LAW

The last straw that breaks the camel's back is the provision in this bill on page 15, that provides that in such hearings before said Board, or any of its agents, the employer is to be tried upon the particular whim of the particular agent who has summoned such employer before him, the following being such provision:

In any such proceeding the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling.

ANY EMPLOYEE COULD CONTINUE LITIGATION

If an employer had 500 employees, and the Board summoned such employer before it upon a charge of unfair practice toward them all alike, and after spending weeks in an exhaustive hearing, such Board should determine that the charge was unfounded, and not sustained, and should discharge such employer, and such decision should meet with the approval of 499 of said employees, the remaining employee nevertheless could appeal such decision to the courts, and force such employer to continue in such expensive litigation, under the following provision on page 19, to wit:

(f) Any person aggrieved by a final order of the Board granting or denying in whole or in part the relief sought may obtain a review of such order in any circuit court of appeals of the United States in the circuit wherein the unfair labor practice in question was alleged to have been engaged in or wherein such person resides or transacts business, or in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, by filing in such court a written petition praying that the order of the Board be modified or set aside.

As I said in the beginning, this bill is a unilateral contract for employers and employees, which means that it is a one-sided contract, with every right and privilege given to employees, and not a right given to employers; but every burden and penalty possible is placed upon all employers.

MEDDLING SNOOPERS

(1) The Board, or its duly authorized agents or agencies, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any evidence of any person being investigated or proceeded against that relates to any matter under investigation or in question. Any member of the Board shall have power to issue subpenas requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of any evidence that relates to any matter under investigation or in question, before the Board, its member, agent, or agency conducting the hearing or investigation. Any member of the Board, or any agent or agency designated by the Board for such purposes, may administer oaths and affirmations, examine witnesses, and receive evidence. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such evidence may be required from any place in the United States or any Territory or possession thereof, at any designated place of hearing.

And if such employer should refuse to be thus examined, or to allow snoopers to go through the books of his establishment at will, or should refuse to jump across the United States at the command of such agent, and take all of his books and records of his business with him to place before such agent, he is to be punished for contempt under this bill.

PERSONAL SERVICE NOT NECESSARY

When an agent wants to serve a far-distant employer with a complaint, or order, or other process, all he has to do is to mail him a copy by registered mail, or else telegraph him, even though he might be away in Siberia, and 10 days later the hearing can be had, regardless of the distance such employer may live from the hearings. I quote this provision from page 22, to wit:

(4) Complaints, orders, and other process and papers of the Board, its member, agent, or agency, may be served either personally or by registered mail or by telegraph or by leaving a copy thereof at the principal office or place of business of the person required to be served.

EVEN OUR GOVERNMENT MUST RESPOND

(6) The several departments and agencies of the Government, when directed by the President, shall furnish the Board, upon its request, all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any matter before the Board.

COUNTLESS STRIKES TO ENSUE

During the period of the World War there were 6,000 strikes against the Government of the United States. Following the passage of this bill, it will take a high-powered adding machine to count the strikes that will occur annually. The following is section 13 of the bill:

SEC. 13. Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike.

I cannot believe that the President of the United States wants such a bill as this passed. He surely has not weighed and carefully passed on all of its provisions. There is not a possible chance for the Supreme Court of the United States to uphold it; it will be set aside as soon as it reaches our high tribunal. So why should we put our Government to a lot of useless and wasteful expense in passing a futile gesture?

A FEW WELL-KNOWN ILLUSTRATIONS IN WASHINGTON

Let me remind you of a few instances here in Washington where union troublemakers interfered with employers and employees. Some of the older colleagues here will remember the Raleigh Hotel strike. There was perfect peace and harmony between the Raleigh Hotel and its employees. Good wages were paid, satisfactory in every way to the employees. Walking delegates first demanded of the hotel that it unionize its employees and sign a union contract. The hotel refused upon the ground that its employees were all well satisfied and did not want to unionize. Then the walking delegates demanded of the employees that they must unionize, and again were told that they did not want to do so, and were perfectly satisfied in every respect. Then force was applied, and the employees were forced to strike, and to demand a union contract, and when the Raleigh Hotel refused to be bulldozed and controlled, and hired other employees, the hotel was picketed for weeks, with three 8-hour shifts of pickets, paid by unions to march around this hotel day and night, with banners calling the Raleigh Hotel unfair, and such banners reading "This is a scab hotel", "No decent people will patronize it", and the matter had to be thrashed out in courts at great expense, before such hotel was protected and given its rights by law. If this bill had been in effect, the Raleigh Hotel would have been helpless, and would have been sandbagged into having its inherent constitutional rights taken from it here in the Nation's Capital.

PICKETING GUDE

Mr. Gude is a well-known florist in Washington. He has spent a lifetime building up his magnificent business here, well known over the United States. He started here many years ago with only a few employees. Now he owns one of the largest florist businesses in the United States, and hires a large number of employees. Union agitators some years ago demanded of him that he unionize his employees. He told them that he would do it if the employees wanted it done. Some of his employees had worked for him for 30 years. All of his employees were well paid, were all well satisfied, and were all loyal to Gude, and stated that they did not want to unionize. Then the union agitators demanded of them that they must unionize, and although threatened with violence, they refused. Then Mr. Gude was embarrassed and interfered with, by having pickets placed around all of his business establishments, and his customers insulted, and he had to resort to the courts before he got justice. If this bill had then been law, he would have been forced to unionize, when neither he nor his employees wanted it done, and when both he and his employees were all well satisfied.

PICKETING REEVES

I remember well the unwarranted interference with Mr. Reeves some years ago. He runs a first-class bakery and delicatessen at 1209 F Street NW. Some of his employees have worked for him for 40 years. All of his employees were paid wages higher than others were receiving for comparable service anywhere in Washington. Demand was made on him by union agitators that he must unionize his employees. His employees refused to do it. They all said they were well paid and were well satisfied. Then he was picketed. Day and night men and women were paid to march in front of his place of business carrying banners calling his store a scab joint, and insulting his many customers by telling them that no decent person would patronize Reeves, and he had to resort to the courts to get his constitutional rights. If this bill had then been law, he would have been deprived of his rights, and his satisfied and well-paid employees would have been forced to unionize and pay monthly dues to unions to pay big salaries to union agitators.

RECENT TAXICAB STRIKE HERE

Our colleagues will remember the recent outrageous taxicab strike here in Washington during the Shriners' convention when the Diamond Taxicab Co. and the Union Taxicab Co., tried by force and violence to force all of the taxicabs in Washington to practically double their rates. Our colleague from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], and his secretary, were forced to get out of their cab, and their driver was attacked, was thrown out of his cab, had his keys taken away, and forced to abandon his car, and such outrages were pulled off all over this city. They did not respect the Constitution of the United States, which forbids anyone to stop a Member of Congress on his way to the Capitol, and when Congressman MAY told these strikers he was a Congressman on his way to attend a committee meeting, they scornfully told him they did not care a d—— about Congress, or a congressional committee or a Congressman, that if he wanted to go to the Capitol, he would have to take a street car, but he could not ride in a taxicab. If this bill had then been law, they would have compelled every driver of every taxicab in Washington to obey their commands, forced upon them by threats, intimidation, and violence.

SALTZ BROS. PICKETED SINCE NOVEMBER

There is a high-class firm of clothiers doing business at 1341 F Street NW., known as Saltz Bros. They have been in business for years. They are paying out thousands of dollars each year for rents and taxes. They have a pay roll which amounts to about $50,000. Last November union agitators demanded that they unionize their employees. All of their employees are well paid, were all well satisfied, and did not want to join any union. Saltz Bros. refused to make them join against their will. And then their business was picketed, and for months has been picketed day and night, with men and women paid by unions to march back and forth, and forth and back, in front of their store and insult and interfere with their customers.

FORCED TO FILE SUIT

Saltz Bros. were forced to hire lawyers, and to file a bill in equity in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, being Equity No. 58083, from which I quote the following from their allegations:

6. Plaintiff further avers that in the early part of November of this year a person purporting to be a representative of the said Retail Clerks' Local Union No. 262, called on one of the officers of plaintiff company for the purpose of inducing said plaintiff to enter into a contract with the said union, which provides, among other things, for the limitation of the hours of labor during which its employees shall be engaged, and also fixes a certain minimum wage scale. The said labor representative was informed that by reason of this being a busy season that time for the consideration of the same be postponed until after the holiday business shall have been disposed of, and thereafter and during the latter part of November the said representative again called for the purpose, and a few days thereafter a telephone call was received importuning plaintiff to enter into the contract referred to. In each case the said representative threatened and intimidated the plaintiff to comply with the demands referred to, otherwise the establishment would be picketed. In the conferences referred to, plaintiff emphasized the fact that the matter in hand required some thought and consideration and asked that further time be allowed for a determination of the question. Plaintiff further imparted to the said union representative the fact that it had bound itself to the terms required by the National Industrial Recovery Act, evidenced by the fact that several N. R. A. insignia are displayed in and on the premises; that the said N. R. A. requirements made provision for a minimum wage scale to the employees and also regulated the hours of employment, all of which were being definitely enforced in the management and conduct of plaintiff's business.

7. Plaintiff further avers that much to the surprise of plaintiff's officers, stockholders, employees and patrons, on, to wit, the 5th day of December 1934, there appeared in front of the premises a man purported to represent the said union organization with two conspicuous signs on his person, which signs are commonly known as "sandwich signs", bearing the following inscription, to wit: "The firm of Saltz Bros., 1341 F Street NW., is unfair to organized labor. They refuse to recognize the Retail Clerks' International Protective Association, Local No. 262, affiliated with American Federation of Labor, approved by Washington Central Labor Union." Since which time there have been three different men so engaged, the names of whom are unknown to plaintiff, though efforts have been made to ascertain the same.

8. The individuals described in the paragraph next preceding, usually known as "pickets", with the display signs referred to, have been patrolling and picketing the premises aforesaid in close proximity to the entrance and the show windows of the said premises, thereby obstructing the entrance and preventing the public and patrons from viewing the display windows and preventing ingress and egress to the store, much to the annoyance and inconvenience of the said public and patrons; and in some instances, upon information and belief, plaintiff avers that its business has been substantially embarrassed, resulting in a diminution of patronage, as well as immediate irreparable injury, loss, and damage, unless a temporary restraining order be issued.

8. Plaintiff further avers that it has never before had any disputes or other difficulty with any labor or other organization having for its interest the benefit of wage earners; that a large part of the merchandise handled by plaintiff consists of union-made articles, and has never had any difficulty with employees with reference to either wages or hours; that all of its employees are satisfied with the treatment they receive as the said hours and wages are regulated by the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, in support of which there is attached hereto and prayed to be made part hereof affidavit of employees made by 25 employees, and also the individual affidavits of certain patrons of plaintiff, being David L. Kreeger, Earle Chesney, Nathan Raffler, Isador Nahmanson, James S. Robb, and E. R. Grant.

9. Plaintiff further avers that the act and conduct of the picketers referred to constitutes a threat and menace against its patrons and accordingly, as plaintiff is advised, the same should be prevented by injunctive relief against a continuance thereof. In spite of the facts hereinbefore averred there remains before the premises of plaintiff the picket hereinabove described, and plaintiff respectfully shows that the presence of such picket constitutes a threat, menace, and nuisance to the peaceful conduct of its affairs.

Wherefore plaintiff, having no plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law, seeks the aid of this honorable court and prays as follows:

1. That writs of subpena be issued directed to the defendants and commanding them and each of them to appear and answer the exigencies of this bill of complaint, but not under oath, oath being expressly waived.

2. That a temporary restraining order be granted forthwith without notice to said defendants, prohibiting them and each of them, their and each of their agents and servants directly or indirectly from interfering with plaintiff's business, and that the picketing referred to be promptly enjoined, etc.

AFFIDAVIT OF SATISFIED EMPLOYEES

The following is the affidavit of the satisfied employees of Saltz Bros., which was attached to said bill in equity:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, to wit:

The undersigned, each for himself, respectively, being first duly sworn on oath according to law depose and say that they are employed by Saltz Bros., Inc., doing business at 1341 F Street, in the city of Washington, D. C.; that in the course of the employment as aforesaid the hours during which they are employed and the salaries received are regulated entirely by the National Industrial Recovery Act, and in the said premises several N. R. A. insignia are exhibited; that the said salaries and hours are fair and reasonable, and that they are satisfied with the same and have no desire to become affiliated with any labor organization having for its prime purpose the regulation of hours and wages.

Affiants further say that for several days past and during the usual business hours there has been a man walking in front of the premises and across the entrance leading thereto wearing a sign bearing the inscription "The firm of Saltz Bros., 1341 F Street NW., is unfair to organized labor. They refuse to recognize the Retail Clerks' International Protective Association, Local No. 262, affiliated with American Federation of Labor, approved by Washington Central Labor Union", in his perambulations as aforesaid interferes with persons from freely inspecting the display windows and as his presence also tends to obstruct the entrance to the building he thereby interferes with patrons and others in their effort to enter the same.

NO RELIEF YET

And union labor is so well entrenched in Washington, D. C., that Saltz Bros. have not yet been able to get any relief, and are still being picketed, with their constitutional rights denied them, notwithstanding the fact that all of their employees are well paid, are well satisfied, and do not want to unionize. But if this bill should become law, they will be forced against their wishes to unionize, and if Saltz Bros. should then say one word against it, they would be fined $10,000, and imprisoned for 1 year.

ANOTHER CASE OF PICKETING

Just across the street from Saltz Bros. is another similar case, where an American employer is being picketed, because neither he nor his employees, who are all well paid, and well satisfied, do not want to unionize.

DELICATESSEN JUST AROUND THE CORNER

Just around the corner from Saltz Bros., on Fourteenth Street, this side of the Hamilton National Bank, is a first-class delicatessen, full of customers all the time, which is being picketed and has been picketed for months, because both the employer and the employees refuse to unionize. The employees are all well paid and are well satisfied, and do not want to join the union. If this bill is passed they will be forced to join.

AM AN OLD-FASHIONED AMERICAN

I am the kind of an American who believes that employees who are well paid and are well satisfied do not have to join a union unless it is their wish and will. I am against forcing them to do anything that interferes with their inherent, constitutional rights. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has expired.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. EKWALL].

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, I was rather amused at the story of our genial friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], the Sage of Abilene, when he told us about the Supreme Court having to teach him his law rather than to get it out of the law books. Of course, that was not the fault of the Supreme Court. That was his fault.

Now, so far as this bill is concerned, as I see it, if passed, it is going to be administered by the National Labor Relations Board. I am sure the gentleman does not mean that he thinks the President of the United States is going to appoint members on such a board who will work unnecessary hardships upon employers or employees.

So far as the constitutionality of this bill is concerned, you know there are lawyers and lawyers. Real lawyers are those who are learned in the law. Then there is another class of lawyers who merely practice law. I presume I am in the second category, but I do not think we need worry about the constitutionality of this bill, because it will be merely up to the board to apply the terms of this bill to a state of facts that it will fit. If they meet such a situation as only applies to intrastate business, of course, if these constitutional lawyers are correct as to the limitations of the bill, the board members will probably keep their fingers out of it. If not, the Court will tell them to do so, or indicate the bounds beyond which their authority does not extend.

As I understand, this bill merely gives the employees the right to have majority rule. That is the right that we have in this body. Our laws are passed by a majority. The entire structure of our Government is based upon majority rule. I take it that labor is merely asking to be heard, and not to have to go to the employer as supplicants. If a majority of the employees of a particular firm cannot say to their employer what they want, how will we ever have any industrial peace? How will we ever stop industrial strife? There may be four or five different groups all in the same organization, each asking for something different. So it seems to me it is at least a wise provision to try something of this kind.

There is nothing in this bill which gives the American Federation of Labor the exclusive right to organize employees. There is not anything in the bill which will eliminate company unions, as I see it. It seems to me it simply gives the men the right to organize and bargain collectively without the domination and interference of the employer, and when the employer does interfere and influence, then, of course, it is not real organization, or bargaining.

This is not a strike law. It does not seem to me to be designed to foment strikes. I take it that its purpose is to obviate strikes. I have had many letters and telegrams from my district for and against the bill. My district and the entire Northwest is paralyzed with strikes today. The lumber industry is entirely at an impasse. Plants are closed down. It is claimed by those who have worked with this bill that it will, if passed, obviate such conditions. I say that we have numerous strikes now. Let us give this a fair opportunity to be tried out. If it does not do the things that the gentleman from Massachusetts and his colleagues say it will, we will not have locked the door for all time. We can repeal the law if it does not do the things we had hoped it would at the time of its passage, and if it proves to be a source of more strikes and trouble than now obtains in industry. It seems to me that this bill is at least entitled to a fair hearing and I believe it is entitled to a trial. I am not certain whether it will do these things, but I hope it will. So let us give it a fair trial.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. EKWALL] has expired.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY].

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, two days ago in this House we passed legislation which we hope will save the farmers. Today in this House we will pass legislation which seeks to save the American laborer.

It was not my pleasure or my privilege to vote for the passage of the original National Industrial Recovery Act. Had I been a Member of Congress at that time, I am sure that I would have voted for its passage, even though we realize now that it was far from a perfect piece of legislation. Although it was not perfect, I am sure that it breathed the true spirit of freedom; freedom from starvation wages, child labor, and unbearable working hours and conditions.

As to the National Recovery Act, our Supreme Court has spoken and no one has a right to challenge the authority of its power nor question the correctness or wisdom of its decision.

The Blue Eagle lived for but a day, but while it lived it held in its claws and clutches the industrial buzzard which had sunken its bill into even the vitals of childhood in the sweat shops of this Nation.

The Supreme Court has spoken, but the spirit of the Blue Eagle lives on and will continue to live until the American laborer is freed from the bondage of economic slavery.

The National Industrial Recovery Act, upon its passage, was hailed by our then newly chosen Chieftain as "a new charter of rights long sought and hitherto denied." I am for this bill because it is animated by the same spirit of freedom. I am for it because it seeks to eliminate the cause of unrest and strife; and fosters, protects, and promotes the free right of collective bargaining, and seeks to give to the American workingman the right to live and be happy.

This bill may not be perfect, but it is at least an honest effort to redeem a campaign pledge of the Democratic Party to give to labor the right of collective bargaining and to protect them in that right. We are tired of platitudes—the law must become sensitive to life and harmonize with the technique of modern industry.

I hope, therefore, that this bill will pass and that the worker of America will no longer be a plaything of fate and forced to resort to industrial warfare to gain the rights which should be his by law.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORITZ].

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman for so graciously giving me this opportunity to take my stand and place myself on record for organized labor.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we are living now in a period of transition under the leadership of a great President who is looking after the rights of the underdog. Every time, however, he tries to protect them and give them something they ought to have, the United States Constitution comes in the way. In past years special privilege has always had its way. I remember an instance in Pennsylvania where a judge granted an injunction against some miners because in a church they sang some songs the employers did not like. Today we have a President who is trying to give these same rights to the underdog. Let us stick with him. We are in a transition period. What we should concentrate on right now is an easier and less cumbersome way of amending the Constitution. The United States Constitution was not framed with the view of dealing with the complexities of life as we find it in this advanced age of machinery and economics with its multiplication of powerful agencies which could not then be foreseen. So it is up to us to find an easier way to amend our Constitution that the people may be given a fair deal. [Applause.]

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this bill is clearly unconstitutional, but I am not going to discuss that feature of it. I shall discuss the details of the bill, for I believe it is a bad bill and a serious menace to the 76 percent of labor that does not belong to unions. There is absolutely no protection in this bill for those men who do not belong to unions. Their rights and their jobs can be destroyed by those who have no respect for the fellow who works but who does not want to support or promote labor disturbances.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will not the gentleman point out the sections to which he refers?

Mr. TABER. That is just what I am going to do if I have the time. I can, however, hit only the high spots. I shall try to do better when the bill is read.

Paragraph 3 of section 8 is a provision which will permit the closed shop to be enforced by decree, which will prevent the fellow who does not want to join the union from having a job at all.

Paragraph (a) of section 9 ought to be called the sell-out section, for where the man does not belong to a union he can have his job rated at almost nothing by the union promoters. There is not any question about that, and no one can deny it. This is the worst section of the whole bill. I read paragraph (b) of section 9:

(b) The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to effectuate the policies of this act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit.

Consider what this provision does—it permits the board to say that the unit shall be a group in a certain territory. Perhaps in that territory will be plants in which the employees are perfectly satisfied with the conditions of employment, plants where there is not the slightest excuse for trouble, but this power to bring that plant in with other plants can create a situation where these men will be forced entirely out of their rights. I do not like to see any board given such power as that.

Now, turn to paragraph (d). The right of appeal is limited to facts that are certified in a transcript by this board; and this board is given the right to conduct whatever hearings it needs in such manner as it pleases.

On page 15, in line 22, you will find this language:

In any such proceeding the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling.

This provision permits this board to rig up the proposition without permitting the party who is cited to be heard at all. We should strike out the word "not" and give these people who will be brought before this board, perhaps from long distances, a fair opportunity to be heard.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. They have every opportunity to come before the board. This provision with regard to the rules of evidence, to which the gentleman referred, holds true in the case of every board the United States has set up.

Mr. TABER. That condition should not be tolerated, because it permits the board to discriminate and prevent the facts being brought out.

When an appeal comes up and the party abused says to the court that certain things were not permitted to be developed, the only way he can get relief is by having the court send the thing back to the same board for further operations. There are no rules at all to protect individuals on a further hearing.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEENEY].

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, in the Seventy-second Congress I voted for the LaGuardia-Norris bill to outlaw the "yellow dog" contract. I voted for the National Industrial Recovery Act because I believed that section 7 (a) was the cornerstone of the act. I believed that it held out a hope to hundreds of thousands of men and women in this country who heretofore were unorganized. They took advantage of that law and joined organized labor in order to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing and to secure a just and living wage.

That act has now been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. The declaration of policy remains, however, and the gains made by labor as a result of the National Industrial Recovery Act are not going to be lost. The laboring groups are going to resort to the only weapon they have and that is to strike when necessary. Read in the report of the American Steel Foundries Co. against Tri-City Central Trades Council case and the opinion rendered by Chief Justice Taft. They have this right which has been ordained to them by the Supreme Court. Unless this Wagner-Connery dispute bill is passed we are going to have an epidemic of strikes that has never before been witnessed in this country. In greater Cleveland alone over 70,000 men and women have joined with organized labor since the passage of the N. R. A. They are not going to stand by and have their wages cut and their hours of labor increased.

Mr. Chairman, who is opposing this bill? The same groups that opposed the Workmen's Compensation Act in every State, the same ones that opposed the mothers' pension acts, the old-age pension acts; the same ones that opposed safety regulations for the railroads and steamships, the same ones that opposed sanitary regulations for the sweatshops and the factories, the same group that upheld child labor. I say if this bill is passed, 5 years from now they will be glad this Congress had the foresight to pass the same because both sides to labor controversies will benefit.

Already the selfish employers of labor have begun to lengthen the hours of labor and reduce the wages of employees. In some States child labor will be as popular as it was before the inauguration of the N. R. A. Price cutting and price fixing, with its vicious cutthroat competition, is the slogan of the hour.

Mr. Chairman, none are so blind as those who will not see. The manufacturer, the industrialist, and the employer of labor who seeks to make profit from the sweat and toil of his employees is just a plain damn fool. The day that labor can be crushed and exploited is over, at least in this country. In my opinion, the gains secured under the provision of section 7 (a) of the N. R. A. will not and should not be abandoned or destroyed.

We have under consideration today a measure passed by the Senate, known as the "Wagner-Connery Labor Disputes Act." This act is designed to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes by the creation of a national labor relations board, to which matters of issue between employers and employees can be referred for settlement. This measure reestablished the principle of collective bargaining, the principle adopted by this administration and manifestly set forth in section 7 (a) of the N. R. A., to which I have referred.

When elections are held on the question of collective bargaining, or on any other issue joined between capital and labor, it will no longer be possible, if this measure passes, for the employer to intimidate, threaten, or influence his employees in voting against their own welfare. If such action does occur, the national labor relations board, under the terms of this act, has the power to step in and conduct an impartial election, free from the domination or influence of either side to the controversy.

Mr. Chairman, strikes are a costly weapon to employers and employees alike. The working class of our country only resort to strikes as a last resort. They have the constitutional right to strike, as I have indicated in my reference to the American Steel Foundries against Tri-City Central Trades Council, cited by the Supreme Court. The workers resort to strikes only to retain their self-respect and the welfare of themselves and their dependents.

Let me read to you the opinion of a late President of the United States, and a former Supreme Court Justice of the United States in the case of American Steel Foundries v. Tri-City Central Trades Council (257 U. S. 184, at 209):

> They (labor unions) were organized out of the necessities of the situation. A single employee was helpless in dealing with an employer. He was dependent ordinarily on his daily wage for the maintenance of himself and his family. If the employer refused to pay him the wages that he thought fair, he was nevertheless unable to leave the employ and to resist arbitrary and unfair treatment. Union was essential to give laborers opportunity to deal on equality with their employer. They united to exert influence upon him and leave him in a body in order by this inconvenience to induce him to make better terms with them. They were withholding their labor of economic value to make him pay what they thought it was worth. The right to combine for such a lawful purpose has in many years not been denied by any court. The strike becomes a lawful instrument in a lawful economic struggle or competition between employer and employees as to the share or division between them of the joint product of labor and capital. To render this combination at all effective, employees must make their combination extend beyond one shop. It is helpful to have as many as may be in the same trade in the community united, because in the competition between employers they are bound to be affected by the standard of wages of their trade in the neighborhood. Therefore, they may use all lawful propaganda to enlarge their membership and especially among those whose labor at lower wages will injure their whole guild.

> The strike becomes a lawful instrument in a lawful economic struggle for competition between employer and employees as to the share or division between them of the just product of capital and labor.

I have repeated the words of the Chief Justice because they are significant. It is a pronouncement from the highest Court in our land.

Hundreds of letters and telegrams come to my desk urging me to vote against this measure. I am firmly convinced in the statement I made a moment ago, that a few years hence many of these misguided employers of labor who are vociferous in their protest against this legislation will be grateful to the Members of the Seventy-fourth Congress for enacting this bill.

We are about to create a law that will promote harmonious relations between employers and employees and prevent untold financial loss to both classes by the elimination of unnecessary industrial strikes. This bill is confined to the elimination of practices which burden or obstruct interstate commerce and is set forth in the committee report. "These words have received repeated recognition in court decisions as in the basis for Federal jurisdiction." Let me say to the employer of labor, no doubt many of you have been victims of unscrupulous, racketeering labor leaders who have tapped you financially under the threat of calling a strike or inciting rebellion among your employees, when no real or legitimate reason necessitated calling a strike. This type of labor leader is few in number and brings odium among the entire labor movement. It is my opinion that this bill is broad enough in its language and construction to eliminate this obnoxious practice, because any attempt on the part of any person to willfully restrain, prevent, impede, or interfere with any member of the national labor relations board, or any of its agents, or agencies, in the performance of their duties, will hold the individual subject to criminal prosecution.

This act cannot and will not interfere with the harmonious relations of those employers, and there are many of them, who treat their employees as human beings, consider them as partners in a joint enterprise and share with them their profits. If the employer class as a group would adhere to this standard there would probably be no need of organized labor today, but unfortunately the greed and selfishness of individuals have asserted themselves since we became the great industrial Nation dealing in terms of mass production.

In many parts of this country men are scrapped at 45 and denied the opportunity to earn a living. In sections not far distant from the Nation's Capital little children have to stand for hours in factories for a mere pittance a day attending the textile and other industries. The amendment to the Constitution seeking to bring about the abolishment of child labor has not yet been adopted, and in many States political influence of those individuals who enjoy profit at the expense of the destruction of the bodies of little children is still strong enough to declare for the right to do as they please under the theory of State sovereignty.

These industrial chain gangs of States, well known to many of us who have studied the question, must be destroyed. They are only comparable to the uncivilized method of prison reformation that displays itself in chain gangs where human beings are locked together while in the performance of labor along the highway of the jurisdiction that has supervision over them. In proportion to the gains secured by organized labor, the unorganized group of the country benefit accordingly. There is always a stiff and bitter fight for organized labor to bring about remedial and humane legislation beneficial to mankind in general.

Practically all of the industrial States now have workmen's compensation acts which insure to the industrial worker medical care and financial aid when they are incapacitated through injury from accident in the course of their employment, and to their beneficiary in case of death there is paid compensation for the loss of life. The workmen's compensation laws, when properly administered, are beneficial to labor and capital. No employer of labor would dare go back to the old days that existed prior to the adoption of the workmen's compensation. The same element who opposed, as I stated, all progressive legislation beneficial to the workers are again knocking at the door of the Capitol urging the defeat of this measure. The distinguished former standard bearer of the Democratic Party and former Governor of the State of New York, the Honorable Alfred E. Smith, in his recent book on Government makes special reference to the opposition of groups I referred to you today to the many progressive measures that have been adopted in the Empire State and other States in the past quarter of a century; were predicating their opposition and stubbornness on the ground that "They just did not know what it was all about." In a charitable vein I am inclined to agree with the author's analysis and conclusion.

The employer of labor is entitled to a fair return on his investment, but never to abnormal profits at the expense of those who create the products he produces. History is in the making today for this Congress, and I am glad to register my voice and vote in behalf of this measure, which I sincerely believe to be for the best interests of capital and labor. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about this bill because of its benefits to labor. I am concerned about it because I believe it will be beneficial to the employers of labor. I am more concerned about it because of the good I believe it will do for the general public of the United States. I believe this is a piece of legislation that will do away with the disastrous labor disputes that the public of the United States has been exposed to for so many years, and, after all, it is the general public of the United States that eventually pays the bill for these disastrous labor disputes. That is one of the primary reasons I am for the bill. I believe it will remove the uncertainty of labor conditions from the general public of the United States, and that it will place business on a more stable basis. I am not here to legislate for labor. I am not here to legislate for capital. I am here to legislate for what I believe to be the interests of the people of this Nation as a whole. In the final analysis, we all belong to that great body, the American public. We have heard a great deal here today about the constitutional features of this bill, employers' rights, State rights, and other rights, but we in the United States should be fundamentally concerned about human rights. Whether they come from States, nations, constitutions, or from whence is immaterial, so they come, but come they must. This is a bill that will give to the laboring men of the United States the right of collective bargaining, and it will set up a tribunal which will force the two contending parties concerned in labor disputes to get together around a table peaceably and arrive at a solution of their difficulties.

We have in this Nation a great body of well-intentioned men and women who are constantly striving to promote international peace. Theirs is a very worthy cause, indeed. Let us first rid our own Nation of the curse of industrial warfare. Let us guarantee to our industrial soldiers the rights to which they are entitled under our Constitution in its preamble. This preamble, among other things, states that the purpose of the Constitution is to promote the general welfare. In my mind that is the prime purpose of the Constitution, and if it cannot do that it certainly fails in its purpose.

We cannot have peace and tranquillity and a more perfect Union unless we insure the welfare of the masses of our people. The right to organize, the right to voice their grievances and to be represented by representatives of their own choosing is essential to the welfare of labor. Every measure ever passed to improve the conditions of labor has been passed over the strenuous objections of capital. After these measures have been in force a short time capital has come to realize their value and has endorsed them. I make the prediction that this bill will be no exception.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the general permission which has been granted by the Committee to revise and extend remarks, I ask unanimous consent to include in the extension of my remarks a short editorial from the Atlanta Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I wish it were possible for me to adopt the view which seems to be entertained by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. EKWALL], as to the duties of a Member of this House in determining for himself as best he can the question of the constitutionality of legislation which he undertakes by his vote to write upon the statute books of this country. As I understood the gentleman in his address he professed no very great concern over the question of whether or not this proposed legislation may be in accordance with the Constitution, but said if there were any portions which in their execution by administrative authority should be in violation of the Constitution the courts would promptly hold them unconstitutional and thereby afford relief. In other words, if this philosophy is to be carried out, the Members of this House may vote for any sort of legislation which is proposed, although in their own judgment it may be clearly in violation of the Constitution of our country and take the position that the courts are not going to enforce it anyway on account of its being unconstitutional, therefore their having voted for it and written it upon the statute books will do no harm. I am unable to feel that I can properly discharge the responsibilities which devolve upon me as a Member of this House and adopt that course.

I hope that the concerted effort about which we read in the press to avoid a roll call on this bill will not materialize, although I have reason to believe it will. It is hard to conceive of 435 men passing a bill of this importance and not as many as one-fifth of them, the necessary proportion to call the roll, being willing for their constituents to know how they voted. Surely no man on an issue of this sort would expect to play both ends against the middle and try to convince those constituents favoring the legislation that he voted for it, and those opposing it that he voted against it. It is a time when good conscience requires that every Member of Congress let his people know at least how he votes on legislation of this kind.

If I were to vote for this bill, I would feel that I was false to the interests of the American laboring man, false to the welfare of industry without which the laboring man himself cannot survive, and I am very sure that I would be false to my oath to uphold and support the Constitution of the United States, as I understand it.

I yield to no man in my devotion to the cause of labor. I have never believed and I do not now believe that our real producers of wealth, in the factory, the mine, and on the farm, have received an adequate share of the products of their toil. I have never failed, and I shall never fail, so long as I am a Member of this body, to vote for legislation which has a tendency to bring to them a greater measure of justice. But I shall not vote to hand to the American workingman a legislative lemon, incapable of enforcement because it is in violation of the Constitution, and therefore calculated only to stir up trouble in industry from which the working classes will suffer more than anybody else, and from which they cannot possibly derive any benefit.

I know this bill is going to pass overwhelmingly. I know that my vote for or against it will make no difference as to its ultimate fate. I am aware that my vote against it will be heralded far and wide in my district as a vote against labor, and that many union men will feel that I have not supported their interests. I realize that the safest political course to take would be to say as perhaps other men are saying today, "I cannot affect the result here by my individual vote, therefore there is no reason why I should consider anything other than my political future, and I shall go along with the tide."

I do not feel that I can take that course and discharge my duty to the men and women who toil in the factories in my district. I do not feel that I can do that, and lie down at night with the feeling that I have been honest with my country and my God. Without regard to when my services here may end, I will go out with the knowledge that during my term of service I have never cast a vote for the sake of political expediency, or knowingly betrayed the real interests of those whom I represent.

I said that this bill is a legislative lemon, and that it will result in no benefit to the workingman. If I am correct in that statement, every workingman ought to approve my vote against it.

I say the courts will not enforce it, because the Supreme Court of the United States has just finished saying once again that Congress is without power under the Constitution to regulate conditions of labor, hours, and wages in intrastate employment. It has been said that an effort has been made to bring this bill within the language of the recent N. R. A. decision in the Schechter case. The only effort that I can see is the stump speech made in section I of the amended bill, which amounts merely to somebody's arguments as to why the Supreme Court was wrong. The author of this argument undertakes to say, among other things, that matters affecting the prices of raw materials, or manufactured goods, which enter commerce between the States, or affecting wages and employment, directly relate to interstate commerce; and yet the Supreme Court has said in the N. R. A. decision:

> The apparent implication is that the Federal authority under the commerce clause should be deemed to extend to the establishment of rules to govern wages and hours in intrastate trade and industry generally throughout the country, thus overriding the authority of the States to deal with domestic problems arising from labor conditions in their internal commerce.
> It is not the province of the Court to consider the economic advantages or disadvantages of such a centralized system. It is sufficient to say that the Federal Constitution does not provide for it.

This bill undertakes to distinguish, in a half-hearted way, between Federal regulation of labor disputes and Federal regulation of hours, wages, and working conditions, but these are inseparably interwoven. Strikes arise over labor conditions, hours, and wages. If the Federal Government admittedly cannot regulate the conditions, hours, and wages, by what rule of logic can it regulate disputes concerning them? It is said that the only attempted regulation is to guarantee the right of collective bargaining. I do not agree with that contention, but even if it were true, the bill must be based upon the claim of a right to regulate, and if regulation may be had in one way, it inevitably follows that it may be had in any way that Congress may decide upon. There can be no piecemeal jurisdiction. If the Federal Government can regulate strikes in any way upon the ground that they directly interfere with interstate commerce, then it can necessarily regulate anything tending to cause strikes, such as wages and hours of employment, for the same reason. It either cannot enter the field at all or it has complete jurisdiction. The Supreme Court has expressly said that manufacturing is essentially local, and that Congress has no right to regulate it. Also, in the language I have quoted, it has held as reserved to the States the authority to "deal with domestic problems arising from labor conditions in their internal commerce." What is this bill but an attempt to override the Constitution as construed by the Supreme Court?

The legal arguments in favor of the constitutionality of the bill are based largely upon a line of decisions discussed by the Supreme Court in the N. R. A. case, and by it differentiated from the rulings it there announced. Dealing with conspiracies to prevent goods entering interstate commerce, or to monopolize interstate commerce in goods, is a very different thing from undertaking to deal with the purely local conditions surrounding manufacture. I shall not discuss these decisions in detail. It is, I think, sufficient to say that there are few lawyers in this body who regard this bill as constitutional under the N. R. A. decision, and most of the legal support for it comes from members who have received their legal training in other lines of endeavor than in the legal profession.

I believe in the right of employees to organize, to join unions of their own choice, and to bargain collectively. I will vote for such legislation if it relates only to interstate commerce or activities directly affecting interstate commerce. But I cannot vote for a bill which enters a field where the Supreme Court has expressly and definitely said we cannot go—that it is reserved to the jurisdiction of the States. This bill by its broad terms covers the attempted regulation of strikes, and of collective bargaining, and of formation of labor unions, in every activity, interstate or local, even in those small businesses that never ship a dollar's worth of goods in interstate commerce. The first Federal court into which a complaint is brought on account of an unfair trade practice will, if the employer raises the point, probably declare it unconstitutional. When the question reaches the Supreme Court, there can be no reasonable doubt but that that body will hold the law invalid. In the meantime, thousands of labor disturbances will have arisen, and the workingmen, seeking relief under this bill, will not have gotten it. They will then realize that Congress for political purposes has "handed them a lemon."

How much fairer and more honest it would be to say, frankly, to the working people of this Nation, "This is the sort of law that only your State legislatures can pass. Anything we do along this line will be held invalid. If we attempt to do it, we are merely piling up trouble for you, with no prospect of benefit, and at the same time we are delaying you in your efforts to secure necessary laws of this character from the only source that can enact them under our Constitution—the legislatures of the various States." If we lawyers in this House were advising these working men and women as clients, that is what most of us would tell them; and I cannot conceive of any reason why a Member of Congress should be less honest with a constituent to whom he certainly owes the benefit of the best judgment he has than he would be with a client in a law office.

I made a speech against the passage of the National Recovery Act through this body and the reasons I then advanced for believing that law unconstitutional were in full accord with what was afterwards decided by the Supreme Court. I believe from the bottom of my heart that this bill you are passing today is just as much in violation of the Constitution as the National Recovery Act, and, believing that, I would be unworthy of the respect of every constituent I have if I did not stand up here and frankly say so. I will be found fighting for the laboring man when many of those who court his favor by advocating something they know can never be effective will be slipping a dagger under his fifth rib in the quiet places where legislation that is effective is oftentimes concocted and wheels oiled to secure its passage. Those who work for legislation in the quiet places do not work for the laboring man. When they want him to think they have done something for him, they go about it with the fanfare of trumpets. He will be wise if he tries out the goods they bring him before he makes up his mind whether they have helped him or not. The proof of the pudding is in the eating.

Under permission granted me, I am inserting at this point the editorial from the Atlanta Constitution, which relates, generally, to the dangers now faced in this country from the threatened usurpation of State rights by the Federal Government:

WHERE ARE THEIR TONGUES?

In his recent address before the Farm Clubs of America, Secretary of Agriculture Wallace made the bold assertion that "we are passing through times when there must be greater emphasis on the Federal Government than on the interests of the several States."

In arguing the necessity for careful study of "the question of State or Federal dominance in the field of government", he takes the further position that "if we are to have a strong nation, we must discover to what extent we must delegate powers to the individual States and to what extent keep them in Federal hands."

Secretary Wallace overlooks the fact that it is not within the province nor the power of the National Government to "delegate" to the States rights and powers that are guaranteed to them under the Constitution.

It is unfortunate that certain of the self-appointed spokesmen of the administration are pressing the subject of further centralization of power in Washington at the expense of the reserved rights of the States.

Professor Tugwell, the no. 1 "brain truster", was the original proponent of this pernicious doctrine, and Secretary Wallace and others of the dreaming theorists who are now assuming to speak for the administration, have been quick to seize upon the proposal.

Fortunately, President Roosevelt has never, directly or indirectly, committed himself to the proposition that the States be forced to surrender the rights that are reserved to them by the Constitution.

Whether or not this agitation will go so far as to bring a direct proposal of a constitutional amendment, it is certain that it would be overwhelmingly voted down by Congress.

If submitted it would not be ratified by the States.

The President has been wise enough not to become ensnared in this dangerous mesh.

Already the Republicans are seizing upon the repeated utterances of some of the "brain trusters" as the basis of the outstanding issue of the campaign of next year. This is evidenced by the action of the so-called "grass roots" convention in which it was boldly proclaimed that the "principle of the rights of the States will be involved in the next national campaign." It was sounded as a pean of hope that this is to be the big issue of the Presidential contest.

Nothing that the President has ever said justifies such a conclusion.

Sooner or later, however, he will undoubtedly be put in a position where he will either have to go along with the Tugwells and the Wallaces or he must disown their pernicious activities in behalf of the creation of an empire with all power lodged in Washington and with the State lines practically eliminated.

It is a dangerous step and one that the people of the country will never agree to.

Senator WALTER F. GEORGE echoed the overwhelming sentiment of the country when in his recent commencement address at Georgia Tech he said:

"The ultimate preservation of the Union depends upon the retention unimpaired of the dual system of government set up by the Constitution. The liberty of the citizens rests at last upon local self-government; upon local institutions administered by local authority, responsive and responsible to local opinion. The decision of the Supreme Court does not call for amending the Constitution or for the surrender of the reserved powers of the States over the intimate personal, business, and social affairs of the people.

"The decision of the Court calls for the full assumption by Congress of its constitutional responsibility in the consideration of legislative proposals. Nothing but disaster lies ahead if those who know well the political theories of history and are yet lacking in the vital sense of the realities of life are permitted to shatter the American system of government and to attempt to remold it in accordance with their desires. It is yet our hope that these theorists, many of whom have encamped in Washington, will have their day and pass away."

In a recent editorial The Constitution called attention to the warning by Daniel Webster of the dangers of tampering with the Constitution. He said in an address on the one hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth:

"Other misfortunes may be borne, or their effects overcome. If disastrous wars should sweep our commerce from the ocean, another generation may renew it; if it exhausts our Treasury, future industry may replenish it; if it desolate and lay waste our fields, still, under a new cultivation, they will grow green again and ripen to future harvests.

"But who shall reconstruct the fabric of demolished government; who shall rear again the well-proportioned columns of constitutional liberty; who shall frame together the skillful architecture which unites national sovereignty with State rights, individual security, and public prosperity? No; if these columns fall, they will be raised not again."

Every word of this is as true today as it was when it was uttered by Webster.

Where is the master mind in the United States Senate today who will utter a similar clarion call against the radical utterances of those who, as in Webster's day, would match their untried theories against the proven efficiency of the greatest governmental document ever written?

The Senate is not lacking in men who can sound a warning as powerful as that of Webster.

But where are their tongues?

Mr. WELCH. Mr Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think this is one of the most important pieces of legislation that the Seventy-fourth Congress has considered. It involves an age-old principle—the desire for freedom. Ever since human history began, in the days of absolutism, in the days of feudalism and serfdom, and finally, under our democratic and capitalistic system, the struggle of the ages has revolved around a desire for freedom, and all this bill is designed to do is to make men free.

There is nothing complicated about this measure that I can see. Everything that was in section 7 (a) that was designed to give men and women the right to organize is in this bill. The only difference between section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act and this measure is that there was not sufficient enforcement machinery set up in the National Recovery Act to enforce section 7 (a), and I may say that even with all its imperfections, as I have stated before, the National Recovery Act was of the greatest value for recovery of any measure that has been enacted by the Seventy-third or Seventy-fourth Congress.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the gentleman for that statement and I may bring it close to home in my State, when I remember that under the National Recovery Act, we put 30,000 unemployed miners to work.

Mr. WOOD. I am pleased to have the gentleman make that contribution.

Now, what does this proposed law do? It sets up a tribunal which is for the express purpose of enforcing the principles of this bill and of section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act, which is to give the men the free and untrammeled right to organize and to bargain collectively, without coercion or intimidation on the part of the employer.

There is not anything new about this. We have listened to a great array of constitutional authority this afternoon. It is unfortunate we did not have the advantage of this great knowledge in the Seventy-third Congress. Probably, we would have enacted a law that would have been more nearly constitutional.

Now, some question has been raised about the Bedford Stone case. This stone was shipped throughout this country by the Bedford Co. Contractors made the contract to buy the stone, the stone was delivered, the operation was complete and the stone had been paid for and was sitting upon the ground ready to be set, and was to go into buildings in intrastate commerce, public buildings or State buildings of all types and kinds, as well as private structures; but because of the fact that the stone had been shipped from Bedford to some other point in the United States, the decision of the Supreme Court held that even though the transaction had been completed between the Bedford Stone Co. and the purchaser of the stone, and the stone had been delivered and was on the ground ready to be set, the stonecutters who refused to set the stone were hampering interstate commerce.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. WOOD. Now, in the Wright case, in 1885, the employees of a coal concern in Pennsylvania, which did not own any part or portion of any railroad, and where the mine was owned and operated wholly within the State of Pennsylvania, the employees had a controversy with their employer and the miners went on strike. A restraining order was applied for by the operator and the court then held that because of the fact this coal was destined for interstate commerce they were in violation of the interstate commerce laws in obstructing interstate commerce.

No one can tell whether this law is going to be constitutional or unconstitutional. No one can say what the Supreme Court is going to hold as to the constitutionality of the law. I say it is a very poor way to get around this legislation. I hope that those who are considering to vote one way or the other on this legislation will forget about the constitutionality of it and vote on the principle established in this measure.

This bill authorizes the National Labor Board to go to the employer; if the employer is against dealing in collective bargaining they are brought to the conference table. The employer is compelled to deal with them, and if they do not agree on wages and working conditions the employees can strike as they do today. [Applause.]

Mr. WELCH. I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. With a concern in my State operating 3 plants, shipping from 1 plant goods manufactured in interstate commerce for sale in other States, and retaining for distribution within the State goods that are manufactured in the other 2 plants. How would this bill affect that?

Mr. CONNERY. There would be a great question whether you are in interstate commerce or intrastate commerce. I cannot answer that off-hand.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This is a practical question. If the employees in the plant from which goods are shipped into other States organize and have a right to bargain collectively, and everything is harmonious between the owner and that group, and in the other two plants they did not desire to organize, and as a matter of fact refused to organize, would not that be another complication?

Mr. CONNERY. I do not think so. In the plant that shipped goods in interstate commerce the Board would have jurisdiction. As to the other two that refused to organize, I doubt whether the Board would go in.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, we have heard from many eminent lawyers here regarding the constitutionality of the bill. I am not a lawyer; therefore, my opinion concerning that part of the bill means little. What I am concerned with is the human aspect of the bill. As I interpret the bill, it is a step in the right direction—to equalize conditions between employers and employees. It will give both employers and employees the right to settle their differences at a council table, instead of the deplorable resort to strikes that have kept the country in a turmoil.

We are living in a changing period. Conditions are not what they were when the Constitution was written. I have the greatest respect for the Constitution, but am enough of a realist to believe that we are living in an age that demands human legislation if we are to continue as a happy Nation—the type of legislation that this bill provides for, and as a member of the committee I sincerely hope that this bill will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GILDEA].

Mr. GILDEA. Mr. Chairman, eternal vigilance is the price that the American workingman must pay for his economic freedom. The Constitution was written as a result of direct action, a strike against the Stamp Act of Great Britain. In order to protect the rights of the American workingman under the Constitution and restore to him the right to collective bargaining which was taken away from him when section 7 (a) was nullified we have this bill today. I hope the Members of the House will pass the bill unanimously.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STACK].

Mr. STACK. Mr. Chairman, as a Representative of the great State of Pennsylvania, whose industries have been controlled by the moneyed interests of Mellon, Atterbury, and Grundy, I feel satisfied that the passage of this bill will be a step in the right direction; that the forgotten man of the happy warrior fame will be benefited immensely by its passage.

The working man and woman in my district need such legislation as this bill proposes and as their Representative, their servant, I shall be glad to support this bill and any other reasonable legislation that will help the working class.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD].

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, I have in my district a great many labor unions and railroad men. I have the second largest shoe factories in the world. We have the International Business Machines Co., that employs thousands of men and women. The Business Machines Co. is a nonunion shop and the shoe factories are nonunion shops. I want what is best for both union and nonunion, and let them decide for themselves. About 20,000 men and women are employed in the shoe factories. If this bill is passed, I want to know whether the shoe factories' union workers in the Eastern States can bring our shoe factories into the union without their consent? I ask that of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CONNERY. I did not quite get the gentleman's question.

Mr. LORD. I have large shoe factories in my district. They are nonunion, and they want to remain nonunion. Is there any way through the operation of this bill that they could be brought into the union?

Mr. CONNERY. Why, no. If they want to stay nonunion, there is nothing in the bill to interfere with that.

Mr. LORD. I understand that you can create a district of the shoe manufacturers of Massachusetts and New York States, for instance, and that by that district they can be brought in without their consent.

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, no. Nobody can force the workers in any plant to join a union who do not want to join it.

Mr. LORD. Cannot they make this a union district?

Mr. CONNERY. No.

Mr. LORD. I think this bill says they can.

Mr. CONNERY. No; the gentleman is mistaken. There is nothing in the bill here that says that.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will yield, paragraph (b) of section 9 does just that.

Mr. LORD. That is the way I read it, and that is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Under that paragraph the Board is given authority to define what a unit is and where the election of representatives is to take place, but that does not in any way compel an employee to join any particular unit. The gentleman is confusing the term "unit" with "union."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LORD. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Here is the situation: If they fix the unit of bargaining so that it covers the gentleman's factories as well as the others, the result of the bargaining will be binding on them.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LORD. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman is misinformed in that matter. The purpose of that amendment is when they have an election in a plant and there are three or four different sorts of unions, or nonunions, the Board may settle which one will be the collective-bargaining unit.

Mr. LORD. This is just what I contend. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has pointed out, paragraph (b) of section 9 allows the Board to form a unit or area and decide the policy of the shops without the consent of the workers. They can include in that area or unit the factories of Massachusetts and the other Eastern States and compel our factories in Binghamton, Endicott, and Johnson City to become union shops against their own wishes.

Few, if any, shoe manufacturers have as high weekly wage as our workers have. They are happy and contented and want to remain so.

I have no objection to any workers joining a union if they so desire, but I do not want this law passed, as this section is without amendment.

The workers in our factories want to decide for themselves and not have some board do it for them.

I hope this section may be eliminated from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, the bill which we are considering this afternoon, known as the "Wagner-Connery labor-disputes bill" is more necessary now perhaps than when it was originally introduced. That condition has been brought about by the recent action of the Supreme Court in invalidating the National Recovery Act. This measure restores collective bargaining. It creates a democracy within industry which gives to our industrial workers the same general idea of freedom which the founding fathers conferred upon citizens of the United States. It prohibits force and intimidation and leaves men to organize or remain unorganized as they shall desire. It will in no way force the small manufacturer in any section of the United States to organize either a bona fide union or a company union within his plant. It merely gives to the workers in both the large and the small plants, in the unorganized plant and in plants where there are company unions, an opportunity to decide for themselves and among themselves without interference the question as to whether or not they want a union and just what nature or character of a union they will have.

This is a practical question and one of the most important and serious questions that we have been called upon to decide at this session of Congress. Human rights, as well as the contentment and happiness and prosperity of our people are involved in this question. I assume that every Member believes in the right of collective bargaining so far as it applies to and concerns the efforts of labor. There are some, however, who may be reluctant to vote for this bill because of its apparent invasion of the rights of our States. There are others who may find fault with it on constitutional grounds. To the former I will say that this measure is intended to apply to those workers whose employment either directly or indirectly comes under the commerce clause of the Constitution. So far as I am concerned I find ample authority for its constitutionality in the action taken by the Senate when this measure came before that body for final action. After listening to a brilliant and scholarly address by the junior Senator from my State, whose record as a jurist and a constitutional authority measures up with the best in the land, the other body overwhelmingly approved this measure, in fact opposition collapsed and there were but few speeches made against the bill and but a handful of votes recorded in the opposition. Those of you who may be doubtful as to its constitutionality, I suggest that you read the speech of the author of the Senate bill and also look over the vote recorded for the bill, which will be found on page 7681 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 16.

The question of State rights is one frequently injected into the discussion of reform measures and in some instances with the same degree of consistency as are these constitutional arguments. There are some who have always held to the theory of State rights, others who have long been defenders of the philosophy of the Federalists, but there are those also to be found who are champions of State rights where State rights means little or no control. There are those who plead the cause of the Federalists when State rights is the only effective instrumentality to meet existing conditions.

I am for State rights when State rights meet the needs of our time, but I believe in the Federal authority when that is the only authority that can bring justice to the masses of our people. In the beginning of our country's history, when factories were small and interstate commerce was almost unheard of, when the carrier pigeon was the fleetest means of communication, when law and authority was promulgated by the free men meeting in the town hall, State rights could protect the workers of our country. The Federal authority was remote and removed and its interference was very properly resented because of the conditions that existed at that time. But today the situation is entirely different.

The rapid growth and development of industry, the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few, the uneven distribution of the wealth produced in the country, the modern methods of communication and transportation, the compounding of intrastate factory units into the national and international industrial organizations, all this has brought about a compelling change in matters such as we are considering in this proposed legislation.

In the old days it was the poor master and the poorhouse for those without funds who were unable to work. Today, by demand of the States, by no action on the part of the federalists or advocates of State rights, the Government was compelled to take over the relief load of the Nation and to provide not only food and clothing but work for the stricken millions of those who were in need throughout every State in the Union. If it is the duty of the Federal Government to assume the tremendous burden associated with the care of our unemployed, then it is likewise the right of the Federal Government to see to it that work opportunities are provided for the citizens of our country. Reform in the economic life of the country is necessary, reform is taking place in every nation in the world, legislation similar to this has been or is being considered in the democratic nations of the world, and by reform we mean and they mean more protection for the masses and more protection is needed because of the changed world in which we are living.

Twenty-five years ago there was one small factory in this country for every 250 people. In 1930 there was only one such factory for every 1,000 people. Thirty years ago 50 percent of the manufacturers in the United States were small enterprises and each produced less than $20,000 worth of goods every year. In 1929, 200 huge corporations owned one-half of the total corporate wealth of America and in 1931, 100 industrial corporations controlled one-third of the total industrial wealth of this country. During all this time the productivity of the individual worker increased enormously and at the same time his real wages diminished out of all proportion, and yet the profits produced by this system increased in an unwarranted degree. This division of wealth can only be solved by the direct intervention of Government exercising its control over commerce and industry or by strengthening the bargaining power of the worker, which is the intent and purpose of this measure.

We cannot continue to permit industry to grow more powerful and at the same time thwart the efforts of the workers to secure a fair share of the fruits of their labors. Every authority worth mentioning in this debate has not only advocated the right of collective bargaining for labor but they have likewise informed us that our economic troubles are caused by an uneven and an unfair distribution of the wealth which labor produces. In the past too much has been utilized for capital expansion, too little has been given to the workers to buy the goods which they produced.

We will not solve our problems by advocating State rights or Federal control. Both have there proper sphere of authority. We must get down to the fundamentals.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, this bill, which is evidently very much misunderstood, does two things·

First. It seeks to make effective the right of employees to organize and engage in collective bargaining.

Second. It defines what is improper or unfair for the employer to do in trying to prevent the accomplishment of that objective.

It does not require an employer to sign any contract, to make any agreement, to reach any understanding with any employee or group of employees. The board created in the bill is not empowered to settle labor disputes; nothing in the bill allows the Federal Government or any agency to fix wages, regulate rates of pay, limit hours of work, or to effect or govern any working condition in any establishment or place of employment.

Nothing in the bill requires any employee to join any form of labor organizations nor does it require any group of employees to organize; it does not require an employer to compel his employees to organize.

These are facts which seem to be misunderstood. This bill is designed to put into force and effect the principle of collective bargaining. It goes no further than has been advocated by many great organizations.

May I say to my Republican colleagues that this measure carries into effect a plank in the Republican National Convention platform which reads as follows:

> Collective bargaining by responsible representatives of employers and employees of their own choice, without the interference of anyone is recognized and approved.

That is the language of the last Republican National Convention.

The right of collective bargaining has been subscribed to by many of the greatest minds this world has ever produced. Abraham Lincoln; Pope Leo XIII; William E. Gladstone; Bismarck, the great Iron Chancellor; Theodore Roosevelt; Woodrow Wilson; Daniel E. Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad; Sir Henry Thornton, head of the Canadian National Railways—all of those great men have subscribed to the policy of collective bargaining.

I confidently say to my colleagues that if this bill is written into the statute books of the United States and after it is placed in operation and thoroughly understood, there would not be 20 votes in this House to repeal it.

The bill should have no opposition. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the committee, Mr. CONNERY.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ARNOLD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1958 and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—TAXATION (H. DOC. NO. 229)

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

To the Congress of the United States:

As the fiscal year draws to its close it becomes our duty to consider the broad question of tax methods and policies. I wish to acknowledge the timely efforts of the Congress to lay the basis through its committees for administrative improvements, by careful study of the revenue systems of our own and of other countries. These studies have made it very clear that we need to simplify and clarify our revenue laws.

The Joint Legislative Committee, established by the Revenue Act of 1926, has been particularly helpful to the Treasury Department. The members of that committee have generously consulted with administrative officials, not only on broad questions of policy but on important and difficult tax cases.

On the basis of these studies and of other studies conducted by officials of the Treasury, I am able to make a number of suggestions of important changes in our policy of taxation. These are based on the broad principle that if a government is to be prudent its taxes must produce ample revenues without discouraging enterprise; and if it is to be just it must distribute the burden of taxes equitably. I do not believe that our present system of taxation completely meets this test. Our revenue laws have operated in many ways to the unfair advantage of the few, and they have done little to prevent an unjust concentration of wealth and economic power.

With the enactment of the income-tax law of 1913 the Federal Government began to apply effectively the widely accepted principle that taxes should be levied in proportion to ability to pay and in proportion to the benefits received. Income was wisely chosen as the measure of benefits and of ability to pay. This was and still is a wholesome guide for national policy. It should be retained as the governing principle of Federal taxation. The use of other forms of taxes is often justifiable, particularly for temporary periods; but taxation according to income is the most effective instrument yet devised to obtain just contribution from those best able to bear it and to avoid placing onerous burdens upon the mass of our people.

The movement toward progressive taxation of wealth and of income has accompanied the growing diversification and interrelation of effort which marks our industrial society. Wealth in the modern world does not come merely from individual effort; it results from a combination of individual effort and of the manifold uses to which the community puts that effort. The individual does not create the product of his industry with his own hands; he utilizes the many processes and forces of mass production to meet the demands of a national and international market.

Therefore, in spite of the great importance in our national life of the efforts and ingenuity of unusual individuals, the people in the mass have inevitably helped to make large fortunes possible. Without mass cooperation great accumulations of wealth would be impossible save by unhealthy speculation. As Andrew Carnegie put it:

> Where wealth accrues honorably, the people are always silent partners.

Where it be wealth achieved through the cooperation of the entire community or riches gained by speculation—in either case the ownership of such wealth or riches represents a great public interest and a great ability to pay.

I

My first proposal, in line with this broad policy, has to do with inheritances and gifts. The transmission from generation to generation of vast fortunes by will, inheritance, or gift is not consistent with the ideas and sentiments of the American people. [Applause.]

The desire to provide security for one's self and one's family is natural and wholesome, but it is adequately served by a reasonable inheritance. Great accumulations of wealth cannot be justified on the basis of personal and family security. In the last analysis such accumulations amount to the perpetuation of great and undesirable concentration of control in a relatively few individuals over the employment and welfare of many, many others.

Such inherited economic power is as inconsistent with the ideals of this generation as inherited political power was inconsistent with the ideals of the generation which established our Government.

Creative enterprise is not stimulated by vast inheritances. They bless neither those who bequeath nor those who receive. As long ago as 1907, in a message to Congress, President Theodore Roosevelt urged this wise social policy:

> A heavy progressive tax upon a very large fortune is in no way such a tax upon thrift or industry as a like tax would be on a small fortune. No advantage comes either to the country as a whole or to the individuals inheriting the money by permitting the transmission in their entirety of the enormous fortunes which would be affected by such a tax; and as an incident to its function of revenue raising, such a tax would help to preserve a measurable equality of opportunity for the people of the generations growing to manhood.

A tax upon inherited economic power is a tax upon static wealth, not upon that dynamic wealth which makes for the healthy diffusion of economic good.

Those who argue for the benefits secured to society by great fortunes invested in great businesses should note that such a tax does not affect the essential benefits that remain after the death of the creator of such a business. The mechanism of production that he created remains. The benefits of corporate organization remain. The advantage of pooling many investments in one enterprise remains. Governmental privileges such as patents remain. All that is gone is the initiative, energy, and genius of the creator—and death has taken these away.

I recommend, therefore, that in addition to the present estate taxes there should be levied an inheritance, succession, and legacy tax in respect to all very large amounts received by any one legatee or beneficiary; and to prevent, so far as possible, evasions of this tax, I recommend further the imposition of gift taxes suited to this end.

Because of the basis on which this proposed tax is to be levied and also because of the very sound public policy of encouraging a wider distribution of wealth, I strongly urge that the proceeds of this tax should be specifically segregated and applied, as they accrue, to the reduction of the national debt. By so doing we shall progressively lighten the tax burden of the average taxpayer, and, incidentally, assist in our approach to a balanced budget.

II

The disturbing effects upon our national life that come from great inheritances of wealth and power can in the future be reduced, not only through the method I have just described but through a definite increase in the taxes now levied upon very great individual net incomes.

To illustrate: The application of the principle of a graduated tax now stops at $1,000,000 of annual income. In other words, while the rate for a man with a $6,000 income is double the rate for one with a $4,000 income, a man having a $5,000,000 annual income pays at the same rate as one whose income is $1,000,000.

Social unrest and a deepening sense of unfairness are dangers to our national life which we must minimize by rigorous methods. People know that vast personal incomes come not only through the effort or ability or luck of those who receive them, but also because of the opportunities for advantage which government itself contributes. Therefore, the duty rests upon the Government to restrict such incomes by very high taxes.

III

In the modern world scientific invention and mass production have brought many things within the reach of the average man which in an earlier age were available to few. With large-scale enterprise has come the great corporation, drawing its resources from widely diversified activities and from a numerous group of investors. The community has profited in those cases in which large-scale production has resulted in substantial economies and lower prices.

The advantages and the protections conferred upon corporations by Government increase in value as the size of the corporation increases. Some of these advantages are granted by the State which conferred a charter upon the corporation, others are granted by other States which, as a matter of grace, allow the corporation to do local business within their borders. But perhaps the most important advantages, such as the carrying on of business between two or more States are derived through the Federal Government—great corporations are protected in a considerable measure from the taxing power and the regulatory power of the States by virtue of the interstate character of their businesses. As the profit to such a corporation increases, so the value of its advantages and protections increases.

Furthermore, the drain of a depression upon the reserves of business puts a disproportionate strain upon the modestly capitalized small enterprise. Without such small enterprises our competitive economic society would cease. Size begets monopoly. Moreover, in the aggregate these little businesses furnish the indispensable local basis for those Nation-wide markets which alone can insure the success of our mass-production industries. Today our smaller corporations are fighting not only for their own local well-being but for that fairly distributed national prosperity which makes large-scale enterprise possible.

It seems only equitable, therefore, to adjust our tax system in accordance with economic capacity, advantage, and fact. The smaller corporations should not carry burdens beyond their powers; the fast concentrations of capital should be ready to carry burdens commensurate with their powers and their advantages.

We have established the principle of graduated taxation in respect to personal incomes, gifts, and estates. We should apply the same principle to corporations. Today the smallest corporation pays the same rate on its net profits as the corporation which is a thousand times its size.

I therefore recommend the substitution of a corporation income tax graduated according to the size of corporation income in place of the present uniform corporation-income tax of 13¾ percent. The rate for smaller corporations might well be reduced to 10¾ percent and the rates graduated upward to a rate of 16¾ percent on net income in the case of the largest corporations, with such classifications of business enterprises as the public interest may suggest to the Congress.

Provisions should, of course, be made to prevent evasion of such graduated tax on corporate incomes through the device of numerous subsidiaries or affiliates, each of which might technically qualify as a small concern, even though all were in fact operated as a single organization. The most effective method of preventing such evasions would be a tax on dividends received by corporations. Bona fide investment trusts that submit to public regulation and perform the function of permitting small investors to obtain the benefit of diversification of risk may well be exempted from this tax.

In addition to these three specific recommendations of changes in our national tax policies, I commend to your study and consideration a number of others. Ultimately we should seek through taxation the simplification of our corporate structures through the elimination of unnecessary holding companies in all lines of business. We should likewise discourage unwieldy and unnecessary corporate surpluses. These complicated and difficult questions cannot adequately be debated in the time remaining in the present session of this Congress.

I renew, however, at this time the recommendations made by my predecessors for the submission and ratification of a constitutional amendment whereby the Federal Government will be permitted to tax the income on subsequently issued State and local securities, and likewise for the taxation by State and local governments of future issues of Federal securities. [Applause.]

In my Budget message of January 7 I recommended that the Congress extend the miscellaneous internal-revenue taxes which are about to expire, and also to maintain the current rates of those taxes which, under the present law, would be reduced. I said then that I considered such taxes necessary to the financing of the Budget for 1936. I am gratified that the Congress is taking action on this recommendation. [Applause.]

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 19, 1935.

LABOR-DISPUTES LEGISLATION

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 1958) to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1958, with Mr. ARNOLD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE].

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I am for this bill unreservedly; I am for this bill with all my heart.

When the Supreme Court struck down N. R. A. it struck down the highest hope of the laboring people of America. It struck it down, however, because in the National Industrial Recovery Act the Supreme Court said the Congress had overstepped its constitutional power by delegating legislative authority to a board, a bureau, or a commission. Reactionaries upon this floor today in arguing against the constitutionality of this measure have pretended that it falls within the category of the Schechter case. They are not familiar with this bill, else they could not and doubtless would not say any such thing.

In this bill we are merely providing five things that we declare as a matter of law constitute labor abuses, unfair labor practices. We ourselves are declaring specific things that are unfair labor practices. Then we set up a board to ascertain states of facts to apply to such legally declared unfair labor practices; and if they find such unfair labor practices as a matter of fact, they then apply the machinery we set up in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, every man here on the Democratic side and every man here on the Republican side, whether he knows it or not, is unconsciously, or else knowingly, in one of two categories. He is either for giving bigger and bigger unreasonable dividends to capital at the expense of those who toil or he is in favor of taking care of the proper rights of those who toil before the larger dividend is passed on to capital. [Applause.]

Before our committee it developed that four cigarette companies—Camel, Lucky Strike, and two others—in the 10-year period from 1924 to 1934, paid their officers exorbitant salaries like $50,000, $100,000, and $150,000, and even more, per year; paid tobacco growers in seven States less and less and less until they were pauperized; let out between one-third and one-half of their employees on account of improved machinery; and, after paying all costs of labor and all shipping charges and all taxes, local, State, and Federal, declared and paid in dividends upon their watered stock the aggregate of $779,000,000; and did that during a time when their chiseling, contemptible, lying, stealing, thieving company unions chiseled in and denied the honest right of collective bargaining to a single independent union in their plants.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EAGLE. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. They made $779,000,000 of profit in 10 years, and their labor costs were 2 percent. These facts were testified to before our committee.

Mr. EAGLE. They decreased the wage per hour successively year after year and increased the hours of labor year after year. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a lot today from constitutional lawyers. I direct attention to the fact that the Constitution of the United States of America was drawn and drafted while Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, was away in France serving as Minister to that country. Upon his return, Thomas Jefferson, whom we all honor, love, and revere, said that the Constitution was not broad enough; and he offered 12 amendments, 10 of which were adopted by the First Congress assembled. These are now known as the "Bill of Rights."

Thomas Jefferson said: "If the Constitution is not right let us amend it." I say that again that day has arrived. Today we listened to a document penned by the President of the United States which is a new bill of rights, a new declaration of independence, if you please. [Applause.] You Republicans will be booing more than that in 1936, and there will be less of you to do it. This is a new declaration of rights, because it undertakes to redistribute the ill-gotten wealth of the millionaire crowd of this country who today are opposing another bill of rights, the Wagner-Connery bill, which is an emancipation for American labor. As Lincoln freed the blacks in the South, so the Wagner-Connery bill frees the industrial slaves of this country from the further tyranny and oppression of their overlords of wealth.

They talk about the Constitution. If I felt the way some of the constitutional lawyers feel about the Constitution and about the decisions of the Supreme Court, I would be in favor of abolishing the Congress and letting the Supreme Court do the legislating for the people of this country.

Mr. Chairman, do you not know if you gave the people of this country a vote on some of these decisions of the Supreme Court, the people would swamp the Supreme Court into oblivion by a vote of 100 to 1? So long as the Supreme Court is abreast of the times and so long as they think in terms of humanity, then I say uphold the Court; but when they change those functions and think in terms of property rights, then it is time for another and more drastic amendment to this great Constitution of ours.

The old fight is embroiled. We see the same old faces that oppose all progressive humanitarian legislation. I say to my friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that the message of the President of the United States which has just been read is an answer to the argument that the gentleman made against the passage of this bill. It is an answer to every one of the constitutional lawyers, and may I say to them: What are you going to do with this sacred old Constitution? You cannot eat it, you cannot wear it, and you cannot sleep in it. [Applause.]

S. 1958, the bill being considered today, commonly referred to as the "Wagner-Connery bill", is designed to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a national labor relations board, and for other purposes. The reasons and justifications for the act are found in these two elemental premises. The two greatest producing classes of this country are the farmers and wage workers, who create all wealth and ultimately pay all the taxes. For the past 30 years both of these wealth-producing and taxpaying classes have been exploited by millionaire overlords and racketeering bankers. The money lenders and Shylocks like scavengers of these human derelicts brought wholesale and instant foreclosure of farms and homes. In many cases they have plucked the feathers and picked the bones clean. As an effective answer to the majority of these human vultures, the Roosevelt administration sponsored and the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses created the Agricultural Adjustment Act, needed amendments to which were adopted Monday; the Farm Credit Administration for the relief and benefit of farmers; the National Industrial Recovery Act for the benefit of industrialists; banking legislation for the benefit of bankers and capitalists; the Home Owners Loan Corporation for the relief and salvation of stricken home owners.

To complete this circle of relief and protection, establishment of a national labor relations board which is a quasi-judicial body for labor with full power and authority to enforce the findings and the rulings is necessary. This bill is the first one to provide for a peaceful forum for both industry and labor and to benefit not only employees but employers and the people at large. It was designed originally to put teeth in section 7 (a) of the N. R. A.

Since the N. R. A. has been declared officially dead by that American dictatorship appointed and sitting for life, the nine men in black—the Supreme Court—the Wagner-Connery bill must now be enacted not to strengthen that section of N. I. R. A. but to present it in a newer, stronger, and more effective form. This legislation is necessary to guarantee to labor the right of collective bargaining. It is necessary to keep the various State militias and national guards at home attending to their own business, professions, and vocations instead of donning the uniform and soldiers' guns to quell and suppress labor strikes and riots that will ultimately result should this proposed legislation be not enacted into law.

The denial by employers of the right of employees to organize and the refusal by employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining leads to strikes and other forms of industrial strife or unrest which have the intent or effect of burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce by impairing the efficiency, safety, or operation of the instrumentalities of commerce, materially affecting, restraining, or controlling the flow of raw materials, manufactured or processed goods from or into the channels of commerce, or the prices of such materials or goods in commerce; or causing diminution of employment and wages in such volume as substantially to impair or disrupt the market for goods flowing from or into the channels of commerce, and thereby bringing said impairments and restraints within the purview of the Congress of the United States and giving that august legislative body sufficient justification for enacting legislation that will in the future guarantee to employees by employers the right to assemble and meet and carry on by collective bargaining their inherent rights and privileges as American wageworkers and citizens.

Whenever the normal flow of the river is obstructed and impeded by water-logged trees and stumps or refuse, the only effective remedy is to either shove, pry out, or blast out these impediments and so put the same logic and process of reasoning when the natural flow of manufactured goods or raw materials which are the products of wageworkers, of men who earn their bread by the sweat of their brows, is impeded, restrained, and obstructed by reactionary, selfish, greedy water-logged employers, then it is high time that Congress should enact legislation to remove once and for all time the causes of the impediments to human progress and welfare.

This bill is designed to promote equality of bargaining powers between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, and was carefully considered by the Committee on Labor and was reported favorably by a unanimous vote of that committee to this body for action. The bill has received the hearty approval and endorsement of Mr. William Green, President of the American Federation of Labor. It has been approved and endorsed by Hon. Francis Biddle, chairman of the National Labor Relations Board in the National Industrial Recovery Act. It has received the approval and endorsement of Hon. Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, and finally it has received the unqualified endorsement and approval of that great humanitarian President, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The bill has already passed the Senate by a vote of 63 to 12. Amendments will be offered today by the committee and your support for which is urged. The amendments are merely clarifying amendments or amendments designed to successfully surmount any obstacles or hurdles that might be thrown into its way because of a reversal by the United States Supreme Court.

Naturally there are many opponents of this bill. There are many opponents who have the fortunate advantage and position of wealth, power, and money. But if you will carefully analyze this opposition, if you will study the reason, if you will look into the source of that opposition, you will find it is an opposition thrown up by the vested interests and the overprivileged wealthy few.

It is thrown up by men who in many cases call themselves employers of labor, but in reality and in truth are assassins of labor, exploiters of labor's toil and despoilers of the meager benefits that might accrue to labor and reward their toil in a fitting manner earned by the right of years of back-breaking and heart-rending toil. Look again at this opposition and you will find the same old faces that opposed the old-age-pension bill, unemployment insurance, and the entire social security program of President Roosevelt. Look again and you will see the same old faces that opposed the A. A. A. amendments passed Monday by this House and designed to place the farmers on an economic basis and parity with their industrialist competitors. You will see those same faces opposing the Wheeler-Rayburn bill which seeks to weed out forever those human octopi and leeches that bleed white the bodies of small investors and consumers of electrical energy, gas, oil, and telephones. Look again and you will see those same faces and individuals bitterly opposing the payment of the soldiers' bonus. They were for the Economy Act that wanted to take away the meager pension granted by a grateful Government to these boys who fought for their country in its hour of need. So there is nothing new in this opposition to the Wagner-Connery bill. There is nothing strange about it. There is nothing to be alarmed about it. This opposition are merely barnacles on the ship of progress. They oppose all humanitarian measures that have for their goals the betterment of human welfare. The tirades of misrepresentation, calumny, and exaggeration are so preposterous and absurd as to be amusing.

Various associations of employers have expressed unwonted solicitude for the rights of employees which they profess to believe are jeopardized by this bill. When did their hearts expand so suddenly? When did their interests in those whom they have exploited for 40 years become so magnanimous? When we enacted into law the National Industrial Recovery Act these same employers welcomed it with open arms. They knew it was designed to pull their chestnuts out of the fire and none of them had the courage nor the hardihood to avow open opposition to the premises of section 7 (a).

They have nightmares now, however, when we propose to enforce the mandate of the law as laid down in section 7 (a). Since when have these assassins and exploiters of labor donned the saintly robes of the Good Samaritan and showered their mellifluent beneficence upon those anointed?

President Roosevelt hailed the N. R. A., insofar as labor was concerned, "a new charter of rights long sought and hitherto denied." That section provided that employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice, and shall be free from the interference or coercion of employers of labor or their agents, and so forth; second, that no employee and no one seeking employment shall be required as a condition of employment to join any company union or to refrain from joining, organizing, or assisting a labor organization of his own choosing; and third, that employers shall comply with the maximum hours of labor, minimum rates of pay, and other conditions of employment approved or prescribed by the President. So it was indeed a new charter of rights if the employer had lived up to it. Unfortunately they did not live up to it. Donald Richberg, the Benedict Arnold of Labor, sold them out for a mess of potage; now the Blue Eagle has been transformed, by the Supreme Court decision, into a blue buzzard, and as General Johnson has so aptly said, "is as dead as the dodo" which is extinct. If section 7 (a) was good and worthy of your support, as it was, and was supported by the great majority of this Congress of the United States, then the Wagner-Connery Labor Relations Act is just as worthy of your support, and needed much more vitally at the present moment.

In the first flush of national fervor and enthusiasm that greeted the inauguration of the National Industrial Recovery Act, the National Labor Board, headed by Francis Biddle, was able by moral rather than the legal authority, to accomplish a good deal in the interpretation and application of the section. Now, that is only an Arabian Nights dream. We are faced with a condition and not a theory. We are faced with the diminution of labor, strikes, and unrest, and unemployment is constantly on the increase. Of course, it is realized that Congress would, however, make a gesture when they passed Public Resolution 44 in the Seventy-third Congress giving the President express, statutory authority to establish a board or boards to investigate the uses, power, practices, and activities of employers and employees in reference to rights under the now defunct section 7 (a). Now, with the adverse Supreme Court decision, such boards established under Public Resolution 44 are without power or authority. The larger employers of labor and exploiters of human toil not only laughed at these boards, they flaunted them, and openly showed disrespect and a woeful lack of cooperation with employees.

Under the old procedure when a complaint was made to the Board, the evidence was heard but the Board had no power to subpena witnesses or administer oaths. If the employer choose to ignore the hearing, he could do so. If the employer failed to comply with section 7 (a) the case was referred to the National Labor Relations Board, but the Board could take no action other than recommending appropriate restitution. There was no legal compulsion upon the employer to comply with the Board's decision. The case had to be referred to the Department of Justice. The recommendations of the Board went for naught and weeks and more after the alleged violation would exist while the Department of Justice prepared its case. When the case was prepared the employer could then go to the courts and obtain an injunction, as was done in the Weirton case. The plain fact is that after 2 years of section 7 (a) the Government succeeded in getting into court only 4 cases for enforcement, 2 being proceedings in equity, and 2 criminal proceedings, and only 1 of those cases—the Weirton case—has come to trial. So we had a law without teeth. A law for the benefit of labor minus the enforcement machinery. In cases where employees were ready to meet and hold elections to select their representatives, employers could hold up for months the election by an application to the circuit court of appeals.

This was done in the case of Firestone and Goodrich, rubber companies of Akron, Ohio, and the National Labor Relations Board was powerless to force action. Unwonted ursurpation of power by employers taking away from employees their rights of collective bargaining and selection of their own representatives could only promote unrest, disorder, strikes, and riots.

In the Firestone and Goodrich cases, strikes were immediately threatened and were only averted at the last minute by appeals to the men to await the decision of the Court on the election orders. The result of all this nonenforcement of section 7 (a) was to plant a wide-spread and growing bitterness on the part of workers who felt, with considerable justification, that they were not given fair treatment, but betrayed by their Government, in the execution of its promises. Then came the Supreme Court decision which knocked down what little structure which the fond hope of labor had built up, and if this intolerable situation is allowed to continue uncorrected it will become a real menace to industrial peace that cannot be exaggerated.

The time for corrective action by Congress is at hand. It should no longer be delayed.

To those unfamiliar with the strife that has been engendered by these unfair labor practices to those who are unable to envision the hatred smoldering in the hearts and minds of those workers whose crust is becoming ever scantier, it might be well to recall that the dire need for this bill, ever-growing industrial unrest, is caused first by the denial of the right of employees to organize and by the refusal of employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining, and, secondly, by their own stubbornness and greed and failure to raise wages, hours, and working conditions satisfactory to the wageworkers. Men can be exploited, they can be penalized, they can be punished, but this constant grinding-down process, this wearing-out process, this brutal tramping on industrial treadmills, engenders such unrest and fosters such disorder that ultimately will lead to riotous revolution. I want to ward off that baneful day. I want to see the emancipation of American labor, not by riotous revolution, but by peaceful evolution.

The ends sought, the goals to be achieved in this bill are not new. The eternal clash between employer and employee shows no improvement, no new development because of the stubborn refusal of employers to bargain collectively. This bill seeks to borrow a phrase of the United States Supreme Court—

To make the appropriate collective action of employees an instrument of peace rather than of strife.

Employers object to employees having personnel managers, paid workers, yet never denying their own right to use such methods. Whenever employers will grant the same rights to employees that they demand for themselves and then agree to sit down and talk the matter over, then we will be getting somewhere.

A former President of the United States, a former Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, and a distinguished Ohioan, William Howard Taft, summed up the issue expertly and concisely when he said—

Labor unions were organized out of the necessity of the situation. A single employee was helpless in dealing with an employer. He was dependent ordinarily on his daily wage for the maintenance of himself and family. If the employer refused to pay him the wages that he thought fair, he was nevertheless unable to leave the employ and to resist arbitrary and unfair treatment.

Those who loudly proclaim "liberty" and who live on the fat of the land are always in the front ranks of those who prate about "rugged individualism." After they have accumulated their own fortune by fair means or foul, they prattle about their own rugged individualism, and if wage-workers attempt to achieve better conditions and better pay and better hours for themselves by the very methods of collective action that has resulted in riches for the industrialists, they, the industrialists, call this procedure on labor's part un-American, undemocratic, unjustified, and unwarranted.

Employers contend that the bill is discriminatory since it is limited to unfair labor practices by employers. It is contended that the bill should prohibit anyone, including, of course, employees or labor organizations, from interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of these rights and that without such provisions the bill is "unfair, and one-sided", and would lead to the domination of industry by organized labor.

The Railway Labor Act contains a reciprocal provision that neither employers nor employees shall interfere or coerce the other in the choice of representatives, but does not cover or attempt to regulate relations of employer to employee. If it were attempted here to define and regulate those relations more far-reaching and drastic provisions would need to be inserted.

Moreover, if provisions were adopted restraining employees from interfering with the rights of employers in selecting their representatives, the opponents would in no sense be satisfied. What these exploiters of labor and opponents of collective bargaining desire is a large ball and chain forged about the ankles of labor organizations and their official representatives.

Based on the erroneous and fallacious theory that labor organizations should be prohibited from soliciting membership among employees, is this doctrine. The provisions of the bill diametrically oppose that employer doctrine. We want each and every employee to be privileged, without interference or coercion, to join the organization that he wishes to join and when he wants to join. Then we want the designated representatives selected in an election supervised by the Government and representing the majority of those employees to bargain collectively with the employer, in respect to rate of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other conditions of employment. Nothing more is asked, nothing less will be satisfactory.

To those opponents of labor organizations and collective bargaining, to those who prattle about the bill being lopsided or one-sided, I would say that this bill is labor's bill. It is a new Magna Carta for employees to protect those employees from further exploitation by selfish, greedy employers. Eleven million workmen are unemployed now, not only because of the depression but because of the unretarded advance of science, invention, and the labor-saving devices of the mechanistic age. Steam shovels, huge trucks and tractors, conveyor systems, fingers, hands, and sinews cast and turned from steel replace by the thousands, human beings. Man power is supplanted by machine power, yet profits go on and in many cases enormous profits. With the displacement of men by machines, these enormous profits accrue to the profit of the over-privileged few. Therefore, we take that labor by giving a bigger share of the loaf through its inherent right and power of collective bargaining by the chosen representatives.

These strongest arguments that can be used against a provision outlawing coercion of employees by employees or labor organizations may be found in the attitude of the courts themselves who have held that a threat to strike, a refusal to work on material of nonunion manufacture, circulation of banners and publications, picketing, even peaceful persuasion constitutes "coercion." In some courts, closed-shop agreements or strikes for such agreements are condemned as "coercive." In this bill we declare that the domination or interference with the formation of any labor organization or contributing finances or other support to it are unfair labor practices. Precedents for this in law are found in the Railway Labor Act, section 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, amendments of 1933 and 1934, and the Emergency Transportation Act, section 7 (e).

Another misrepresentation is that this bill outlaws and prohibits company unions. That is not true, although nearly 70 percent of company unions now in existence were established subsequent to the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act. In other words, after the employer was amply protected through the N. R. A. then those who were greedy, not all of them by any means, organized their own company unions so as to comply with the spirit of Section 7 (a) but not with the letter of the law. Naturally the company union, sponsored, promoted, and financed by the employer, is found to a great extent in the large, powerful, and rich industries. It is here that the bargaining power of the individual workers is most weak, and in most instances in these huge plants workers have not enjoyed the privilege of organizing. There is nothing in the bill that prevents the formation of a company union. This bill merely gives them an opportunity to choose for themselves. If the company union is the free choice of the majority of the workers all well and good. If the American Federation of Labor or some other union happens to be the free choice all well and good. Let there be no interference by the employer in respect to that free choice.

A common form of interference by employers is their participation in the management of the company union and espionage. Another is the provision in the company union's constitution that changes or alterations cannot be made without the consent of the employer. With these nefarious practices industrial life for the worker becomes a vicious application of the old arm game "heads I win, tails you lose." Another pernicious practice is the payment of additional compensation to workers representing the company union or permitting such representatives to "sell" the company union to the employees during working hours without any deduction of pay.

The various and sundry forms of interference within referred to by employers, promote unrest, dissatisfaction, strife, and resentment, and revolt against the existing order of things. These common forms of interference by employers have long been recognized by the courts. Chief Justice Hughes writing for unanimous Court states in a decision under the Railway Labor Act of 1926:

The circumstances of the soliciting of authorizations and memberships on behalf of the association, the fact that employees of the railroad company who were active in promoting the development of the association were permitted to devote their time to that enterprise without deduction from their pay, the charge to the railroad company of expenses incurred in recruiting members of the association, the reports made to the railroad company of the progress of these efforts, and the discharge from the service of the railroad company of leading representatives of the brotherhood and the cancelation of their passes, gave support, despite the attempted justification of these proceedings, to the conclusion of the courts below that the railroad company and its officers were actually engaged in promoting the organization of the association in the interest of the company and in opposition to the brotherhood, and that these activities constituted an actual interference with the liberty of the clerical employees in the selection of their representatives.

In those most flagrant cases of interference wherein several of these forms of interference exist, we must conclude that that employer dominates the will of the company union thus affected.

An obnoxious form of interference is the discrimination displayed in hiring employees and the tenure of employment based upon the employees' affiliation with labor organizations that are distasteful to the employer. This form, commonly known as "yellow dog" contracts, was outlawed by section 7 (a) of the N. R. A., which was the section that was the recipient of the notorious Richberg double-crossing interpretation.

Nothing will be found in this bill that prevents employers from exercising their natural rights of selecting employees or discharging them. What is intended is that unfair employers shall not put discriminations or penalties on those workers who will not willingly join the company union dominated by the company. Hence we say to the employer, hands off the employee elections. Let those workers exercise their own free will and judgment and select the labor organization which appeals to them most. Wide-spread misinterpretation as to the closed-shop status under this bill exists. Closed shops are by no means imposed upon all industry nor is new legal sanction given to closed shops.

Nothing in this bill or in any other statute illegalizes closed-shop agreement by the employer and labor organization provided such organization has not been created or supported by any practice defined in the bill as an unfair labor practice, and provided further that a certain organization is the free choice of the majority of employees as the appropriate collective-bargaining unit covered by agreements made.

Neither are the closed-shop agreements legalized in any State where it may be illegal. To those who entertain fears in this direction, I would say that no closed shop may be affected by this or any other legislation unless that agreement is approved and assented to by the employer. The fourth unfair labor practice is in respect to discharges of employees by employers because that employee has filed charges or given testimony as provided for in this bill.

The fifth unfair labor practice obviously is manifest to all. That is, the refusal of employers to enter into collective bargaining with employees. If industrial peace is ever to be permanently established, it must be on those broad principles of give and take which can be done only through collective bargaining and the making of agreements mutually satisfactory. I will vote for the bill and do everything in my power to secure its early enactment into law. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH].

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, there are many Members of this House who do not agree on a great many questions affecting labor with the Chairman of the House Labor Committee, but as a member of that committee I want to take these few minutes to pay tribute to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CONNERY, chairman of this committee, who is always championing the cause of labor in this House when we need him.

We have come a long way in eliminating the distress and hardships of those who toil. The Members of this House realize that too long in this Republic we have seen the crucifixion of labor upon the cross of longer hours, less pay, and unsanitary working conditions. Today the situation is not perfect, but we find that marked progress has been made, especially in the last 2 years. Ill-gotten wealth and special privileges given to certain employers helped lead this Nation on its march into the valley of the shadow of death. Under the leadership of President Roosevelt and his administration, we have realized that the prosperity of this country depends, first of all, upon the men and women who produce the wealth of the 48 States. [Applause.] An immediate and progressive program for helping the laboring men of this country was inaugurated when this administration came into power. We gave them not only their old jobs, but we tried to create new tasks for them as well.

May I read a short editorial from Collier's Weekly just recently published:

The most important fact in the history of labor during the last 12 months has been the great gain in employment. Business improvement has created more jobs. Unemployment still exists, but the principal relief work of the Government is now being carried on in the drought area rather than in the industrial centers.

Many people have been excited and alarmed at the increased number of strikes during the year. There is no real occasion for concern. Strikes are a familiar experience during periods of recovery. At the bottom of a depression organized labor calls few strikes. Later, when there is more to be had, controversy naturally arises.

The useful course is for labor and all other groups concerned now to work out a program and a policy to eliminate future need of emergency action.

Under this legislation, as we consider it here today, the employer is not compelled to give to the employee a different scale of pay or a different work week, or he does not have to enter into any agreement with the employees. It simply brings to labor the right to deal with the employer in a legal way that we should desire earnestly to see exercised. Favorable action on this bill will help to lift from labor its burden of despair and throw a light upon the dark pathway that the worker too long has traveled. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 3, strike out the words "declaration of."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. The inequality of bargaining power between employer and individual employees which arises out of the organization of employers in corporate forms of ownership and out of numerous other modern industrial conditions, impairs and affects commerce by creating variations and instability in wage rates and working conditions within and between industries and by depressing the purchasing power of wage earners in industry, thus increasing the disparity between production and consumption, reducing the amount of commerce, and tending to produce and aggravate recurrent business depressions. The protection of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively tends to restore equality of bargaining power and thereby fosters, protects, and promotes commerce among the several States.

The denial by employers of the right of employees to organize and the refusal by employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining leads to strikes and other forms of industrial unrest which burden and affect commerce. Protection by law of the right to organize and bargain collectively removes this source of industrial unrest and encourages practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial strife.

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to remove obstructions to the free flow of commerce and to provide for the general welfare by encouraging the practice of collective bargaining, and by protecting the exercise by the worker of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of his employment or other mutual aid or protection.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, strike out beginning with line 4 down to and including line 3 on page 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SECTION 1. The denial by employers of the right of employees to organize and the refusal by employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining lead to strikes and other forms of industrial strife or unrest, which have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce by (a) impairing the efficiency, safety, or operation of the instrumentalities of commerce; (b) occurring in the current of commerce; (c) materially affecting, restraining, or controlling the flow of raw materials or manufactured or processed goods from or into the channels of commerce, or the prices of such materials or goods in commerce; or (d) causing diminution of employment and wages in such volume as substantially to impair or disrupt the market for goods flowing from or into the channels of commerce.

"The inequality of bargaining power between employees who do not possess full freedom of association or actual liberty of contract, and employers who are organized in the corporate or other forms of ownership association substantially burdens and affects the flow of interstate and foreign commerce, and tends to aggravate recurrent business depressions, by depressing wage rates and the purchasing power of wage earners in industry and by preventing the stabilization of competitive wage rates and working conditions within and between industries.

"Experience has proved that protection by law of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively safeguards commerce from injury, impairment, or interruption, and promotes the flow of interstate and foreign commerce by removing certain recognized sources of industrial strife and unrest, by encouraging practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial disputes arising out of differences as to wages, hours, or other working conditions, and by restoring equality of bargaining power between employers and employees.

"It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to eliminate the causes of certain substantial obstructions to the free flow of interstate and foreign commerce and to mitigate and eliminate these obstructions when they have occurred by encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and by protecting the exercise by the worker of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of his employment or other mutual aid or protection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the committee amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to compliment the Chairman of the Labor Committee and the members of the committee for bringing in a bill which appears to be written in the interest of the American working man. I hope that it will be administered in strict equity, in recognition of the interest of the employer as well as the employee. I am only sorry that this disputes bill does not settle the disputes which take place in governmental circles.

I call attention to a dispute or controversy which is taking place today and in which Mr. Mitchell, recently removed Assistant Secretary of Commerce, makes certain specific charges. I also call attention to an item taken from today's newspaper, in which it would appear that Mr. Ickes is not working harmoniously or in agreement with Mr. Hopkins, the Federal Relief Administrator. I have written an article for my periodical this month wherein I devoted almost a page in criticism of Mr. Ickes' action here in Washington in the discharge from employment of retired enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. After reading this newspaper item, I feel inclined to commend Mr. Ickes, here on the floor, for his attitude in reference to the expenditure of the work-relief funds. In my opinion, Mr. Ickes is the smartest man in the "brain trust." He has shown decisively that he is in favor of doing something constructive for the American people and spending this huge work-relief appropriation on projects which will be an asset to the American people rather than wasting and squandering the money on projects of questionable merit under the Hopkins' plan of limiting the expenditures to $1,100 or $1,200 per man, including the cost of materials and overhead. [Applause.]

I have heard a disquieting rumor recently. It may be only the kind of a rumor the soldiers call a "guardhouse" rumor. Nevetheless, I have been told that Mr. Ickes is to lose control of the C. C. C. and that it is to be turned over to Mr. Hopkins.

In my opinion, Mr. Fechner, Mr. Friant, and the other gentlemen who have handled the C. C. C. personnel and administration have been very efficient and conscientious in their efforts. Of all the new-deal agencies, I am convinced that the C. C. C. is the most efficient and is making more substantial returns on the investment, notwithstanding its huge cost, than any other of the various alphabetical agencies established in the new deal.

If this rumor is authenticated, I wish to protest at this time the contemplated transfer of the C. C. C. organization to the jurisdiction of Mr. Hopkins, whose life experience as a welfare worker does not, in my opinion, qualify him for the responsibility of handling an organization such as the C. C. C. Mr. Ickes and Mr. Fechner are practical business men, and are to be commended, along with Mr. Friant, on the successful administration and development of the C. C. C. organization.

We have just heard a very excellent message from our President on the question of taxation. I am proud of the words he has uttered. I only hope that they will not prove to be mere empty words, but that they will be backed up by decisive action to accomplish the enactment of the program he has so ably outlined. On June 8 of last year we heard a message on this floor promising the people old-age pensions, but after the expiration of a year what, actually, have we? Nothing but a pauperized old-age-pension bill.

In my opinion, the President's message on taxation is a perfect document; but, unfortunately, it appears to be, for a time at least, only a promise. Action on his tax program is to be deferred until next year. If this legislation is of importance, as the President indicates, and as I firmly believe, why can we not enact it now? The interests of all the people are involved. We should tax entrenched wealth and inordinate profits. We should not adjourn and go home until we complete the job. Personally, I am fed up on the promises and bait we are handing out to the American people while they are starving. Common sense, sincerity, and honest dealing with the American public demand action now. [Applause.]

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RICH: Page 4, line 16, insert, after the word "states" the following:

"To make effective the policy declared by the President of the United States 'the Government makes clear that it favors no particular union or particular form of employee organization or representation. The Government's only duty is to secure absolute and uninfluenced freedom of choice without coercion, restraint, or intimidation from any source.'"

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to state to the Membership of the House that if this amendment is adopted it will only make effective the President's declared policy which he has advocated and I hope the Membership of the House will see fit to adopt this proposal of the President. If you adopt it, you are then advocating the principles which he has enunciated with respect to justice to labor and to capital and the free will to join any organization. If you do not adopt it, then you turn down his expressed request insofar as handling the affairs of capital and labor, in my judgment, is concerned.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I will simply say in answer to the statement of my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, this bill, as it is now drawn up and as it has been reported to the House by the Committee on Labor, is the bill which the President approves.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; certainly.

Mr. RICH. Is it going to be the practice that any amendments that are presented here are not going to be permitted to be considered by the Membership of the House because of the fact that this is a cut-and-dried or dyed-in-the-wool bill and we must accept it as is?

Mr. CONNERY. I may say to my friend from Pennsylvania that we have no idea whatsoever of saying that an amendment offered by any Member here should not have consideration, but the gentleman in his address mentioned the President and I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this bill, as reported by the Committee on Labor to the House, is in the form in which the President would like to see it passed. This is all I said. The gentleman is entitled to his view of the matter, but I hope the gentleman's amendment will be voted down.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have not spoken on this particular bill today because of the fact I think no one is in any doubt as to where I stand upon this measure, but the amendment just proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is nothing but an amendment which has for its purpose the beclouding of the issue which this bill is designed to meet.

We have heard a lot of talk about constitutionality and I am getting so sick of listening to constitutional lawyers get all excited whenever we bring up a bill for the workers or the farmers or any one of the groups of America's common citizens that I think it is the opinion of the people of this country, as well as my own opinion, that these so-called "constitutional lawyers" are getting to be a pain in the neck. [Laughter and applause.] Sometimes they almost sound as if they were trying to prove to you, if they are special-privilege lawyers, that the Constitution itself is unconstitutional, especially if they have been retained to defend the unfair advantages of special privilege gained under a vicious system of labor exploitation of the past.

I wish to make this statement with respect to the Wagner-Connery labor bill. The principle of the bill is exactly the same principle that is contained in the Railroad Labor Relations Act that this Congress passed years ago. There is nothing in the bill that has any harm for industry, but it does make industry meet the worker on the common American ground of dealing over a conference table instead of dealing with him with State troopers and with hired thugs whenever there is a labor dispute.

I have received a number of letters from certain persons in my district in which they say that if this bill were passed the workers would be coerced into some labor organization of one kind or another. To make my position entirely clear, I wish at this point to insert a copy of my reply to those who have an unjustified fear of the effects of this bill.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your communication in connection with the enactment into law of the legislation known as the "Wagner Labor Disputes Act."

In frankness, I must state at the outset that I am thoroughly in accord with the principles embodied in the legislation. It provides, briefly and simply, to make the right to bargain collectively and provide a recognized formulæ for investigation and adjudication of disputes between employees and employers a statutory regulation.

I see no menace to American industry in the above proposal, and while not agreeing in detail with some of its provisions, believe it is a forward step. The Railroad Labor Act, applicable to a particular industry, is an excellent example that such legislation can be and has been of unusual benefit to industry. I need only point to the many years of excellent relationship between the railroad employees and their employers under this act; the peaceful adjudication of the many disputes brought before their board; the fine working conditions and high standard of wages in the railroad industry, to show that a national policy toward labor disputes is the reasonable way to approach the national problem of industrial peace.

I find nothing in the present legislation which would give sanction to any closed-shop proposition as charged. The right of collective bargaining for the sale of the only commodity which labor has to offer is a fundamental right and should be recognized by law. The freedom of the individual worker to select those who shall represent him in that bargaining should also be guaranteed by law just as the freedom of individuals to select their representatives in bargaining for trade, in legal actions, etc., are indisputably upheld.

While here and there unscrupulous labor leaders or unscrupulous employers use various methods of coercion to obtain unjust or unfair ends, the only person who can decide what is coercion is he upon whom it is practiced. I am sure if you would compare the Wagner-Connery bill with the provisions of Public Law 152 and the subsequent amendments to this law, that you will find they embody the same principles. I know that in view of the successful history of the Railroad Labor Act that no one would be inclined to ask repeal of that law. The Railroad Labor Relations Act being the model upon which the Wagner-Connery bill is based, I am confident that this new legislation for all American labor will have the same successful history as has the pioneer law in the field of labor relations.

Now, this bugaboo of "coercion" is a lot of "baloney"! Who can decide whether coercion has been practiced upon a worker to join a labor union except the worker himself, and if you ask any member of any union whether he has been forced to join he will give you the answer to this propaganda. Who ever heard of a company union that was really organized solely for the benefit of the workers? The organization of a company union presents the same ridiculous spectacle as would be presented if an employer were to organize a lodge or society for his workers to belong to. Imagine, if you can, an employer saying to his employee, "John, I hear you are going to join the Moose, or the Elks, or some other fraternal organization, but I think I can fix up a better society for you to belong to." This would be no more ridiculous than is the proposition of the employer saying to his employees, "Since you have decided to join a craft guild or union, I have decided to fix one up that will be better for you than any organization you can join which has been created and organized by the members of your own craft." The intelligent American worker knows well enough that any union organized by employers is not for the benefit of the employees, but is bound to be just the opposite sort of an organization.

I think this bill ought to pass. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to be voted down. The amendment is practically the same as was discussed at the other end of the Capitol by those gentlemen who are always worrying about the rights and interests of the overprivileged classes rather than the woes, problems, and injustices perpetrated on the underprivileged of America's citizens. I hope the amendment will be voted down, and I hope that any other amendments which are nothing but a repetition of amendments discussed and defeated in the other body will likewise be defeated here and that we can send the bill back to the Senate as it was originally written and give labor the justice and the right to which it is entitled under a government where majority rule is the underlying and founding principle. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not be adopted, because the amendment deals with relations between employee and employee, whereas this bill deals with relations between employer and employee.

As to the term "coercion", the courts on numerous occasions in labor controversies have construed the word "coercion" to mean almost anything, insofar as employees are concerned.

The courts on many occasions have construed mere peaceful persuasion as coercion. If this amendment is adopted, it will kill the effects of the bill. It will not only do that, but if this amendment is adopted and the bill is passed it will put labor in a worse condition than it was before.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that on page 4, line 22, the Clerk be permitted to correct the spelling of the word "representatives."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. When used in this act—

(1) The term "person" includes one or more individuals, partnerships, associations, corporations, legal representatives, trustees, trustees in bankruptcy, or receivers.

(2) The term "employer" includes any person acting in the interest of an employer, directly or indirectly, but shall not include the United States, or any State or political subdivision thereof, or any person subject to the Railway Labor Act, as amended from time to time, or any labor organization (other than when acting as an employer), or anyone acting in the capacity of officer or agent of such labor organization.

(3) The term "employee" shall include any employee, and shall not be limited to the employees of a particular employer, unless the act explicitly states otherwise, and shall include any individual whose work has ceased as a consequence of, or in connection with, any current labor dispute or because of any unfair labor practice, and who has not obtained any other regular and substantially equivalent employment, but shall not include any individual employed as an agricultural laborer, or in the domestic service of any family or person at his home, or any individual employed by his parent or spouse.

(4) The term "representatives" includes any individual or labor organization.

(5) The term "labor organization" means any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work.

(6) The term "commerce" means trade, traffic, or commerce, or any transportation or communication relating thereto, among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State or other Territory, or between any foreign country and any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory, or between points in the same State but through any other State or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any foreign country.

(7) The term "affecting commerce" means in commerce, or burdening or affecting commerce, or obstructing the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute that might burden or affect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce.

(8) The term "unfair labor practice" means any unfair labor practice listed in section 8.

(9) The term "labor dispute" includes any controversy concerning terms, tenure or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.

(10) The term "National Labor Relations Board" means the National Labor Relations Board created by section 3 of this act.

(11) The term "old Board" means the National Labor Relations Board established by Executive Order No. 6763 of the President on June 29, 1934, pursuant to Public Resolution No. 44, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1183).

With the following committee amendments:

On page 6, line 10, beginning with the word "traffic", strike out "or commerce, or any transportation or communication relating thereto", and insert "commerce, transportation, or communication."

Page 6, beginning in line 20, strike out all of subsection 7 and insert in lieu thereof:

"(7) The term 'affecting commerce' means in commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, at the end of line 22, substitute a comma for the period and add the following: "and reestablished and continued by Executive Order No. 7074 of the President of June 15, 1935, pursuant to title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act (48 Stat. 195), as amended and continued by Senate Joint Resolution 133, approved June 14, 1935."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, this is not a committee amendment. We have not had a chance to call the committee together between Sunday and today, due to early morning meetings of the House. This is taking care of the transfer of the funds of the old Board to the new Board. The President by Executive order kept the old Board in a sort of status quo until this bill is passed by Congress and signed by the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Massachusetts made the statement that this is not a committee amendment. I question whether the Membership of the House is prepared on the spur of the moment to adopt the amendment to this legislation presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I think until the committee has had an opportunity to discuss and thoroughly digest the amendment, it should not be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MARCANTONIO: Page 5, line 22, after the word "as" strike out the words "an agricultural laborer."

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I desire to state that I have made my position clear throughout the committee hearings as well as in executive sessions of the committee and on the floor of the House, that irrespective of whether or not my amendment is adopted, I am whole-heartedly for the bill and naturally shall vote for it.

My amendment, if adopted, would permit the benefits of this act to extend to the agricultural workers. It is a matter of plain fact that the worst conditions in the United States are the conditions among the agricultural workers. They have been brought to the public attention many times; for example, by the investigations of the National Child Labor Committee into the horrible conditions, especially as affecting children, in the beet-sugar fields. The complete denial of civil liberty and the reign of terror in the Imperial Valley, where the basic demand of the workers was clean drinking water, have been the subject of investigation by Government agents. Last summer saw a protracted and heroic strike by the terribly exploited union workers in the fertile fields of Hardin County, Ohio, against their employers. These workers were organized in a local of the A. F. of L. They were victims of the usual type of oppression which was called to public attention in the press.

However, the most conclusive proof that there must be Federal action to protect the right of agricultural workers to organize is to be found in the situation in Arkansas. In that State, within the last year, there has come into being an admirable union of agricultural workers, the Southern Tenant Farmers Union. It has been incorporated under the laws of the State. Its immediate demands are entirely reasonable and its methods have been extraordinarily peaceful. Yet that union is at present holding no meetings on advice of its counsel who says that it cannot be protected from terroristic attacks. Armed planters have patrolled the roads looking for the principal organizers of the union. The president of the union, a former rural school teacher, was driven out of the county by threats of lynching. Members of the union have been beaten up. Some of them have been cast in jail from which they were ultimately delivered but only in one or two cases after they had been confined on trumped charges for 45 days. Meetings have been forcibly broken up. The lawyer for the union is C. T. Carpenter, one of the outstanding lawyers of the State of Arkansas. He was waited on by an armed mob one night in his own home. He met them at the door with a pistol in his hand. The mob left but not without firing shots at the house.

What these people in Arkansas are organizing against is the most outrageous exploitation in America. The plantation system of itself is damnable. It combines the worst evils of feudalism and capitalism. The overseers on the plantations go armed.

A continuance of these conditions is preparing the way for a desperate revolt of virtual serfs. Unless the right to organize peacefully can be guaranteed we shall have a continuance of virtual slavery until the day of revolt. The union and the exploited victims of this system have shown an amazing willingness, or rather a deep-seated anxiety, to avoid bloodshed.

I, therefore, respectfully submit that there is not a single solitary reason why agricultural workers should not be included under the provisions of this bill. The same reasons urged for the adoption of this bill in behalf of the industrial workers are equally applicable in the case of the agricultural workers, in fact more so as their plight calls for immediate and prompt action.

I am not making any appeal to gentlemen who are opposed to this bill. Naturally if they have no sympathy for giving industrial workers the rights and guarantees under this bill, they are opposed to giving agricultural workers any rights, but I appeal to the membership of this committee and to those who are in favor of the bill. I advance the argument to you, that if the industrial workers are entitled to protection, then by the same token the agricultural workers are entitled to the same protection under provisions of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, the committee discussed this matter carefully in executive session and decided not to include agricultural workers. We hope that the agricultural workers eventually will be taken care of. I might say to my friend from New York at this point, certainly I am in favor of giving the agricultural workers every protection, but just now I believe in biting off one mouthful at a time. If we can get this bill through and get it working properly, there will be opportunity later, and I hope soon, to take care of the agricultural workers.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I oppose this amendment most emphatically, because if this language is taken out of the bill as proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, it would mean that all agricultural laborers would come under the provisions of the bill. I grant there may be some sections of the country where it would be desirable to permit the organization of share-croppers or tenant farmers or other types of agricultural labor, but in the vast sections of the Middle West, especially in those States where the farms are smaller and more or less of a family affair, where only the family is employed on the farm except with occasional employment of others, it would be very unfortunate to permit the organization of casual farm employees. In some States of the Union, especially in the Middle West, the farmers seldom employ more than one or two employees, and then for only seasonal employment. I do not believe that it is advisable to bring them within the scope of the bill.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. We passed the triple A bill here, and you have not done a single thing for the agricultural worker.

Mr. BOILEAU. The agricultural worker is not a problem in some of the States. In some of the States they have practically no employees in the generally accepted sense of the term.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. The gentleman stated a moment ago that he believed in taking one bite at a time, carrying the inference that ultimately under this legislation it is proposed to organize agricultural laborers.

Mr. CONNERY. I did not say just exactly that. If the gentleman asks me personally how I feel about the organization of agricultural workers, I certainly hope they will organize just the same as industrial workers.

After thorough consideration, our committee decided, at this time, not to include agricultural workers.

Mr. KNUTSON. For the time being? That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I take this time to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] a question. Does the gentleman from New York believe that agricultural workers would come within the definition of the Supreme Court of "interstate commerce", so that they could come within the purview of this act?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I think that the agricultural workers should be included to the same extent that the industrial workers are included.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I think so, too, but, under the N. R. A. decision of the Supreme Court, they could not be included in this bill, unless they came within the term "interstate commerce." The gentleman knows that.

Mr. LORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I yield.

Mr. LORD. Does not the gentleman think that the agricultural worker is entitled to a 30-hour week just the same as the man who works in the shoe factory?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I personally believe that the agricultural workers should have all the protection we can give them, but the point which bothers me is the question whether the Congress has jurisdiction over them unless they come within the meaning of the term "interstate commerce." If we have the power to do it, we should include the agricultural workers.

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RICH: On page 6, line 9, at the end of the last paragraph, insert the following:

"The term 'labor organization' shall not include any organization defined in the preceding paragraph unless said organization files with the National Labor Relations Board its acceptance of the following conditions of operation:

"(a) That all elections and votes on strikes shall be by secret ballot.

"(b) That a reliable accounting system will be maintained, and will be audited at least annually, with reports promptly and duly made to a meeting of the members, and a copy filed with the National Labor Relations Board.

"(c) That its membership books, or rolls, will not be closed to new members, and all applicants will be admitted to membership, except for good cause shown relating to the individual applicant.

"(d) That all of its objects and purposes are lawful.

"(e) That it will not instigate, maintain, or support any strike for an illegal purpose.

"(f) That it will not instigate, maintain, or support any strike in violation of any collective-bargaining agreement, or in opposition to any arbitration award rendered pursuant to an agreement to submit to arbitration.

"(g) That it will not instigate, maintain, or support any strike to further any issue which the employer offers to submit to arbitration pursuant to section 12 hereof.

"(h) That it will not instigate, maintain, or support any strike, except as a last resort after making all reasonable efforts to settle the issues by direct negotiation and governmental mediation.

"(i) That it will agree to submit all jurisdictional disputes to arbitration pursuant to section 12 hereof, and will not engage in any jurisdictional strike, in cases where other organizations, parties to such dispute, likewise agree to submit to arbitration.

"(j) That it will not instigate, maintain, or support any strike designed or calculated to coerce government or any agency thereof either directly or by inflicting hardship upon the community, against any action on the part of the State, or Federal Government, or any of the agencies, or political subdivisions thereof.

"(k) That it will not instigate, maintain, or support any strike except in furtherance of a trade dispute within the trade or industry in which the strikers are engaged.

"(l) That it will not coerce, or attempt to coerce, any worker to join any particular labor organization.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this section of the bill. It introduces the subject of strikes, and the bill is dealing with the subject of what are labor organizations.

Mr. LESINSKI. It looks like a bankers' bill.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that the amendment itself does its own speaking and it is not necessary for any Member of Congress to make any comment on it at this time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ARNOLD). The Chair is inclined to think that the amendment is not subject to the point of order. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENNEY. I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KENNEY: Page 7, line 9, after the word "commerce," insert "or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute, burdening or obstructing the national defense which affects commerce."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

SEC. 3. (a) There is hereby created as an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government a board, to be known as the "National Labor Relations Board" (hereinafter referred to as the "Board"), which shall be composed of three members, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. One of the original members shall be appointed for a term of 1 year, 1 for a term of 3 years, and 1 for a term of 5 years, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of 5 years each, except that any individual chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate one member to serve as chairman of the Board.

(b) A vacancy in the Board shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the Board, and two members of the Board shall, at all time, constitute a quorum. The Board shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

(c) The Board shall at the close of each fiscal year make a report in writing to Congress and to the President stating in detail the cases it has heard, the decisions it has rendered, the names, salaries, and duties of all employees and officers in the employ or under the supervision of the Board, and an account of all moneys it has disbursed.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 7, line 24, after the word "created", strike out: "as an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government" and insert in lieu thereof: "in the Department of Labor."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think the question involved in this amendment is the most important one involved in the bill. The question of whether or not the agency set up to administer this law shall be an independent agency of the Government or under one of the executive departments is, in my opinion, the most important provision in the bill.

I regret that I cannot agree about this particular question with the chairman of my committee, for whom I have the highest regard, or with the Secretary of Labor, for whom also I have a very high regard.

In addition to the matter of policy I call the attention of the members of the committee to the fact that making this an independent agency will strengthen the reception given this law when it reaches the Supreme Court. The decision of the Court in the Schechter case indicates that one of the troubles with that case was the delegation of power to the executive department. The decision of the same Court rendered on the same day holding that the President had no authority to remove Commissioner Humphreys from the Federal Trade Commission gives even more evidence of the fact that if we make this an independent agency it will have more strength when it reaches a test in the Supreme Court. In 5 minutes' time I shall not be able to read references from the decision, but I do want to read one paragraph from that decision. In referring to the Federal Trade Commission the Supreme Court said:

To make this possible Congress set up a special procedure, a Commission, a quasi-judicial body was created, provision was made for formal complaint, for notice and hearing, for appropriate findings of fact supported by adequate evidence, and for judicial review to give assurance that the action of the Commission is done within its statutory authority.

Further on in the decision the Court referred to the fact that the Members of this body, the Federal Trade Commission, are free from any influence in the executive department and free from all political influence except in the matter of appointment.

If this committee amendment is voted down I expect to offer an amendment to strike out, on page 3, in line 24, after the word "created", the words "as an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government", so that we simply create a board that is not in any other agency of the Government, not a part of the executive branch of the Government at all. I submit, as a friend of the bill, that if this law is to succeed it must succeed through the support of public opinion.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, this question was fully debated in the committee. Mr. Biddle, the Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, and Senator WAGNER are in favor of making it an independent Board, appeared before our committee and so testified. The Secretary of Labor appeared before the committee and wanted the Board established under the Department of Labor. President Green, of the American Federation of Labor, appeared before the committee and wanted the Board placed under the Department of Labor. Their reasons were that it had taken many years to create a Department of Labor, to create a Cabinet position for Labor, and that any independent board set up away from the Department of Labor would be a weakening of the Department.

I consulted with the President at the White House in reference to this. After that conference I returned to my committee and reported its result, and the committee decided to put the Board under the Department of Labor.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Georgia has pointed out, this is the most important question over which the committee disagreed.

I find myself unable to agree with the decision of the committee to affiliate the National Labor Relations Board with the Department of Labor. It is clearly immaterial whether this affiliation is accomplished merely by providing generally that the Board shall be located in the Department of Labor, or by providing in detail that the Secretary of Labor shall control the personnel, the regional agencies, and the budget of the Board. Regardless of variations in language, if the Board is placed within the Department, the Secretary of Labor will control the purse strings, and that control will be the decisive factor in determining the extent and the character of the personnel, the nature of the work done, and the administrative set-up of the Board, both in Washington and throughout the country. This in turn will be determinative of the major policies of the Board, as I shall presently discuss. On this issue there can be no compromise—either the Board must be completely independent or it must be reduced to the level of a departmental bureau.

I should have thought that even without regard for the past history of the National Labor Relations Board and the testimony before this committee, both of which seem to me compelling upon this point, precedent alone would have induced the establishment of the Board as an independent agency. The Board is to be solely a quasi-judicial body with clearly defined and limited powers. Its policies are marked out precisely by the law. That such an agency should be free from any other executive branch of the Government has been the recognized policy of Congress. Ready examples are the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Communications Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the National Mediation Board, and agencies that are even less judicial in character, such as the Federal Housing Administration and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It seems strange that this committee, which has built up so fine a record in the interests of labor, should be grudgingly unwilling to establish for the protection of labor's most basic rights an agency as dignified and independent, and as likely to attain the prestige that flows from such independence, as those which have been established to protect the interests of other groups.

The vital need for the complete independence of a quasi-judicial board that must enforce the law has been best illustrated by the collapse of section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act. That famous section broke down, not so much because the Recovery Act into which it was written did not contain adequate enforcement provisions, but because the actual enforcement of 7 (a) was tied up with the wrong agencies. The Labor Board, it is true, could make decisions, but actual enforcement rested with the National Recovery Administration and the Department of Justice. Since the N. R. A. had other functions, such as code making, and so forth, which required constant cultivation of friendly and conciliatory feelings between the N. R. A. and those with whom it had to deal, the N. R. A. has been forced repeatedly to compromise and bargain away the specific rights guaranteed by section 7 (a). And the Department of Justice likewise has been reluctant to act upon this touchy subject, because of entirely extrinsic consideration of government policy that should have had nothing to do with section 7 (a). The complete frustration of the present National Labor Relations Board has resulted from this very simple failure to maintain the traditional and tested division between quasi-judicial bodies on the one hand and the general work of executive departments tied up with the governmental policy of a particular administration, on the other.

This anomalous situation would be perpetuated by placing the National Labor Relations Board in the Department of Labor. The Department is an executive arm of the Government. The Secretary of Labor is an officer of a particular administration, and I say this from the long-range point of view, and with due regard for the abilities of the present Secretary. The Department is thus quickly susceptible to political repercussions, and it is charged with many administrative duties involving constant compromise between industry and government. Thus the Board would quickly be swallowed up in the general policies of the Department of Labor.

These difficulties are not answered at all by insisting that the judicial decisions of the National Labor Relations Board would not be subject to review by the Secretary of Labor or by any officer in the executive branch of the Government. If in fact the Board were to be independent in its actions, there would be no reason for anyone wanting to set it up in the Department of Labor. But that is not the case; the final judicial decisions are only a small part of the work of such a Board, and by control over other stages in the enforcement process the Department of Labor would be the final arbiter of the policies of the Board.

For example, to be effective in enforcement, the Board must control complaints of unfair labor practices from their very inception. Yet this would not be the case were the Board in the Department. It is quite true that the proponents of placing the Board in the Department insist that there should be no mediation or conciliation done by the Board. But that does not preclude the possibility of mediation of an unfair labor practice by the Conciliation Service of the Department before the Board would act. And in the long run, that would inevitably result from locating the Board in the Department, while its advent would be hastened by an administration unsympathetic toward labor. This is the very worst kind of confusion of conciliation and quasi-judicial work, not in that the Board will do both but that both will be used at successive stages in attempting to enforce the law.

What will result from such a procedure? Conciliation at the source will not build up the kind of records that the Board might later refer to the courts for enforcement. Compromise of the law at the outset will constantly plague the Government when the time comes to vindicate the law. A wide variety of interpretations without any centralizing force will create uncertainty and distrust. The National Labor Relations Board will be called into operation only where there has been a record of failure rather than success; only when the prestige of the Government has already been impaired by the failure of its agencies. Moreover, the duplication of effort and the long delay before complaints of unfair practices finally reach the Board will wreak havoc upon workers' rights. The worker who is wronged must get help quickly if at all. The injury of the long delay can never be redressed. The occasion to protest by his own collective action, once let past, can never be recalled. These are not fancied evils; they are present now because of the very policies which I do not wish to see continued.

To prevent unfair labor practices, the National Labor Relations Board must have control of enforcement not at the end of the trail but from the very beginning. It must follow the procedure that is followed by the Federal Trade Commission in preventing unfair trade practices. No one would suggest, when there is a claim of an unfair trade practice, that there should first be mediation by the Department of Commerce and then action by the Commission in the event of failure.
